The time was when a library was very like a museum, and a librarian was a mouser in musty books, and visitors looked with curious eyes at ancient tomes and manuscripts. The time is when a library is a school, and the librarian is in the highest sense a teacher, and the visitor is a reader among the books as a workman among his tools. Will any man deny to the high calling of such a librarianship the title of profession?—Melvil Dewey, The American Library Journal, Volume I, Number I

Ideas are a challenge. They should be analyzed, tested through intellectual debate, and formed into policy in the legislative arena.

The American Enterprise Institute's publications and audio/video cassettes are a part of that process.

Your library patrons, students, business or club associates are indelibly affected by the presentation of new ideas, new concepts, new ways to attack old problems.

AEI books and audio/visual programs tackle today's difficult problems. They present varying points of view on questions in economics, law, government and foreign policy.

Accept our invitation.

Problems of Maturity

"THE NEED TO KNOW" is the title of this Centennial Issue of Library Journal because that simple phrase succinctly captures the raison d'etre of libraries. Whether it is to support the curricula of schools and colleges, the research of scholars, the daily information needs of citizens, or the constant information demands of commerce, libraries exist to fulfill the need to know.

In our society that need has been a changing thing. Once we saw it as the need to provide knowledge to facilitate the assimilation of immigrant groups into something we called "American society." Some of our founding leaders even saw libraries as a preventive "safety valve" to counter the importation of alien political and social beliefs that might have revolutionary impact on our culture. Others interpreted the need to mean providing skills and training that would allow deprived socio-economic classes to begin their upward march to equality.

In more modern times we have expanded on the translations, and the "need to know" has taken on gargantuan proportions. We agree to supply any information we have to anyone who wants it for any purpose. We promise to make no social or moral judgments about the information or to whom it is delivered. We serve scientists and school children, workers and managers, revolutionaries and fascists, liberals and conservatives alike, equally.

To allow us to carry out that seemingly impossible mission, that social commitment, we have developed a voluminous set of principles and dogma that assert that government, pressure groups, and individuals cannot and should not place obstacles in the way of our efforts to collect the material and distribute it to meet these disparate, and sometimes conflicting demands. We assert that we will take strong measures to defend our right to conduct ourselves in this way.

In retrospect, our services and our dogma in their support, have responded to the economic, social, and political cycles of the society we serve. We have pursued various definitions of "the need to know" through affluence and depression, war and peace, eras of massive public support, and times of institutional poverty. We've provided adult education programs, readers' advisors, employment information, recreation, and a warm shelter in which to pursue them. We've joined reading programs, war information efforts, wars on poverty, and civil rights movements. We were there with radical students, flower children, college presidents, "captains of industry," soldiers in battle, and with ethnic minorities struggling for equality.

by John N. Berry, III

Through it all we've tried hard to satisfy that "need to know" of each era. We've even over-reached and lived with the frustration of failure. But we've had our victories too, and felt the joy and gratification of success.

The period of our greatest affluence is just ended. Even though our professional association and Library Journal are both 100 years old, libraries are much older in America. Our government published a report about their progress in 1876. We're probably as old a profession as any, and certainly much older than the relatively young nation we serve. If one can be allowed a little anthropomorphism, American libraries are approaching what humans call middle-age at about the same time as our country and most of its institutions. But with skill and luck libraries will serve for centuries longer. Unlike humans, they can be reinvented, reinvigorated, and even begin life all over again.

The purpose of these 24 essays by librarians and friends of libraries is to assess the prospects of libraries at maturity, one synonym for "middle age." Like middle-aged humans, however, they've begun to develop some aches and pains. Libraries are a little tired, they've been through and seen a great deal, and we who work in and for them would like nothing better than to rest on our laurels, and quietly go about our business of serving the need to know. The 23 authors that follow offer many different and sometimes conflicting views of the future of libraries. Many of them would disagree with the notion that these venerable institutions have reached "middle age" or maturity. Some even suggest that they're over the hill. To introduce them, however, this editor will assert that most of the problems libraries face in the next two decades are related to these overriding problems of library middle age, problems of maturity.

Goal displacement

One of the most common symptoms of institutional maturity is when the perpetuation of the institution and the solving of its problems of internal operation become more important to it than its original purposes. Many institutions in our society, including libraries, exhibit frightening levels of this kind of goal displacement. We won't waste space on parallels with public or higher education, except to suggest that you consider the way in which grades and grading systems, an obsession with method, a burgeoning, although antiseptic literature of education, constant experimentation with theory, and growing bureaucracy have invaded the classroom. As both Major Owens and Hendrik Edelman point out below, disenchantment with formal education is growing, posing a threat to academic libraries, and an opportunity for public ones.

In libraries the signs of goal displacement are many and varied. The comparatively large amounts spent on such items as cataloging, processing, networks, security, circulation control, and other professional elaborations at the expense of materials and services exemplify the problem.

Read Maurice Freedman's essay for a view of the growing gap between users and library catalogs. Note John Corbin's fear that we must implement better national plans " . . . before the country is saturated with incompatible and competing networks . . . "

Every time a library pays as much to process a book as to buy it, every penny it spends on devices and materials to police lending periods and circulation, every dollar syphoned from materials and services budgets to buy reserve book cards, operating machinery, forms for any of a thousand housekeeping jobs, is an expenditure for internal procedures that drains resources from the primary mission—to serve the need to know.

One could go on and on listing the many ways in which librarians spend, and sometimes waste, scarce resources on internal procedures that do little to enhance service to users or gain support.

Signs of hope

If our maturity has brought dangerous levels of goal displacement, it has also brought us the first signs of hope that some of the problems, internal problems, that have caused this expense are either solved or nearing solution.

Hendrik Edelman points out that academic and research libraries, because of shrinking resources, are being forced to reevaluate collection policies, to abandon the "we buy everything" models of our departed affluence for more careful selection procedures and policies.

Susan Martin and Richard DeGennaro see great hope that automation and technological change may allow reallocation of precious money and staff from processing, to programs and services. This is a direct result of professional maturity, the expensively gained sophistication and understanding of what cooperation and technology can realistically achieve.

On the other hand, Maurice Freedman points out that our national library, and our national efforts to gain that elusive control over bibliographic data have allowed us to follow the lead of the research oriented, better supported libraries, at the expense of the average library user. We have created standards, formats, and basic elements of entry that constitute a foreign language for the average library user. Many of our tools of access to library collections are actually barriers to library utilization for the average citizen. This is what we mean by goal displacement.

If recession forces more careful collection development, less emphasis on internal problems, and more service, it may be the proverbial dark cloud with a silver lining. If librarians cannot readjust, and if professionals cannot get back to a primary concern with user service, as ALA President Allie Beth Martin has often urged, our maturity may simply become decrepit old age. But Clara Jones, in her essay, suggests that for public libraries there is a new service emphasis in information and referral programs. In Detroit she has created one of several models for other libraries. And the movement among public library systems to redefine their goals, recently started at Memphis, suggests that as one benefit of our maturity, we are beginning to look again at ways to put new emphasis on the user, and less on the traditional ways in which we have built libraries and their programs. Memphis is currently engaged in following up its redefinition as an information center by inaugurating that service.

One very positive aspect of this trend toward public library information and referral services is that it is one of the experiments that succeeded, and did so with the help of federal funds. The Neighborhood Information Centers project, supported by Health, Education, and Welfare Department grants, has not been uniformly successful, but the public libraries of Detroit and Houston have proven that it can work, and those in which the program has failed initially, Queens, Cleveland and Atlanta, have provided important lessons. That is one purpose of federal aid to libraries, and the NIC program is one to which the profession can point with pride. It is further evidence that we have matured, and can learn from success and failure. The fact that this money was spent on services, and not on more elaborate structures or on new solutions to internal problems, is further evidence that some libraries are committed to returning to their primary mission.

But despite these signs of hope, there is still a disquieting tendency to spend most of our professional creativity in arcane study and experimentation to solve internal operating problems, some of which are unworthy of all the conference time, pages of print, and formal or informal communication they receive. We are constantly experimenting with new devices to change our methods for lending, processing, and securing collections. We engage in over-heated debate on the most exotic questions of classification or bibliographic entry. We create elaborate new administrative structures and procedures, and dutifully report them to our colleagues in print or from pulpits. And we have created hierachies of professional expertise, on almost every internal problem from book pockets to staff evaluation. We have even been able, in some libraries, to convince budgeting authorities to underwrite our faddish infatuations, such as floating public bond issues to pay the high cost of changing the classification scheme and its notation on our collections. This effort has solved some real problems, but much of it has contributed to the neglect of our primary mission, to serve users. A fundamental reallocation of staff time and library money from these sometimes useful, but often wasteful obsessions of our professional maturity could do a lot to restore our diminishing credibility with governing authorities and users. More important it could free our resources to begin the primary job, fulfilling the need to know for all citizens.

The experience trap

The classic way to solve a library problem is to find someone else who has solved it. Librarians use this method almost exclusively. We check in the next town, with colleagues at the next convention, or scour the literature, and usually we find someone who has dealt with the problem and we adapt or apply that solution.

Often the best solutions to our problems are found this way. Indeed, with our professional maturity has come the implicit belief that there are very few library problems that haven't been solved somewhere, sometime. One of the comforts of institutional maturity is that body of experience upon which professionals can depend when they face problems. As a field we have a great wealth of experience, and it is manifested in the large number of professional consultants we employ, the literature we have created, and the fine institutions we have built.

The problem with using experience at the source for solutions is that we rarely allow new ideas, particularly those from other fields, to penetrate our practice. We even ask of our library schools, that they give new librarians full grounding in our experience, and that they forego such academic niceties as theory or research. We are a practical lot, and we expect new librarians to know enough to start work the day they are hired.

With the maturing of the library this dependence upon past experience has permeated nearly every aspect of our practice. We have developed book selection tools for which the main criterion for including a title is "tested usefulness." We have a plethora of rules, regulations, and procedures (such as that of levying fines for overdue materials) that although they are part of our long history, actually become obstacles to the use of our facilities and materials. We are so convinced that experience is "the best teacher" that we are often unwilling to act unless we can find precedent for that action. In short, for many libraries, overdependence on past practice, whether in our own institution or others, has become a trap—the experience trap.

The experience trap often leads to the professional belief that the library, as it currently exists, is the best model for the library as it should exist. The result is that "new" services are often retreads of the past, extensions of both the good and the bad we already practice. Since we have this wealth of experience, we begin to assume that our problems cannot be caused by internal forces (after all, we have solved most of them by now). The problems we have, following this line of thought, must be due to forces beyond our control—inflation, recession, or an unappreciative and shortsighted public led by equally unappreciative and shortsighted officials who won't provide the support we obviously need.

In our library schools, our professional meetings, and in our practice, we begin to base our services on this ideal library that our experience has created, despite the fact that we have been told for years, and especially in the Public Library Inquiry of the fifties, that for all our rhetoric, we really only reach a small elite.

Our professional pressures to conform to the dictates of this obsession with experience account for some of the worst excesses of libraries.

User participation

We have not yet, for instance, solved the problem of making sure that users have a substantial role in the definition of the service we give them. At the national level, we have allowed a commission to develop plans for a library system that may, indeed, have in it all the elements of the information system we have dreamed about, but the input of real library users into that plan, that national system looking for a problem to solve, was restricted to a few public hearings out in the countryside.

At the local level, whether in academe or in the other communities we serve, input from users is usually limited to the traditional suggestion box, and we normally respond with change only when pressure is applied.

We continue to talk about the "nonuser," that heathen we with our "library faith" have never converted, yet we rarely ask that nonuser to tell us why we don't meet his or her needs to know.

The results of this closed system are visible everywhere. We find public libraries discovering that independent agencies provide the same information service they are starting. They have competed with the United Way, with private industry, with other social agencies for service options. Even in this issue of LJ there is an implied competition between public libraries and institutions of higher education to decide which will provide for the need to know that growing interest in informal, continuing education will bring.

In our library schools this experience trap has led to curricular schizophrenia, as our educators try to balance the profession's pressure to produce librarians with "experience" with the need to develop sound theoretical approaches to the library problem. Students uniformly complain of "busy work" on the one hand, and lack of meaningful skills on the other.

For the beginning professional the experience trap usually results in a first work experience that lacks real professional content, little participation in operating decisions, and next to no opportunity to bring about change of any kind. In our maturity we tend to regard all newcomers as immature, simply because they suggest change, without realizing that somewhere in our history someone else suggested the same change and we either rejected it or tried it and failed.

No responsible person would suggest that we abandon the experiences that have brought libraries to their present levels of excellence. On the other hand, unless we find ways to allow our own new librarians, our current users, and those legendary nonusers to tell us their ideas for library change, we stand a good chance of losing, by default, some of our natural functions to that "polyglot collection of information specialists" that Major Owens predicts. Couple that with his predictions for a more demanding public, requiring that all institutions be accountable, and you have the most dangerous threat of all.

Again, one must turn to the special library for a model. There it is definitely the users who have defined the service. And there is where the librarians, the information managers, have responded—not with networks, not with systems, not with processing problems to solve—but with information, information in whatever form the users required, at the least cost. To do it they have not "collected everything," or bogged themselves in arcane discussions of which classification notation would best apply. Obviously, when the user is also the boss, decisions are easier to make, and problems are solved quickly, or a new "information manager" is found. Those of us involved in public and academic libraries must soon follow this lead, respond to users as if they were (indeed, they are) the bosses, and give them the service bosses should get.

School vs public

One crucial example of the way our experience trap works is in our discussions of the public need for two, separately operated and governed library systems for children. The notion that an over-taxed public must support these often duplicative, and very expensive systems will be hard to sell to that new citizen, hungry for information, and demanding accountability. While many can and do cite good reasons for both a school and a public library to serve the young, the fact of most glaring impact for the elected official and the voter, is that he or she is being asked to support a double effort in this area. We are already witnessing disaffection with this library tradition, this idea based on past practice. In New York State, an official body has already recommended that the systems be merged. In other places we are receiving early warning signals in voter refusal to pass the book budgets for school libraries.

Lillian Shapiro calls her essay in this issue of LJ "a grim fairy tale for children." She paints a bleak picture for the future of school libraries. Lillian Gerhardt echoes this sentiment in her essay on public library service to children, noting the neglect in which it stands today.

Yes, we have developed a substantial defense of both systems. But a great portion of that rhetoric has resorted to assertions that to combine this service to children will result in administrative chaos, unclear lines of authority, and thus ill-defined service responsibility. Because we haven't been able to solve this problem from our past experience, we tell the voters and the officials that we can't. The experience trap once again.

New blood, new ideas

Crucial to the rebirth of libraries is their ability to attract and employ new talent. This doesn't necessarily mean youthful talent, although it can. Right now there are very few library jobs, and plenty of new librarians. Among them are the leadership we will need in the next two decades. As Kathleen Weibel points out in her essay, half of the women, and about 44 percent of all those in librarianship will retire in the next two decades. While we agree with Tom Galvin that a redirection of our library schools toward the provision of continuing education opportunities for working professionals is much needed, we hope that the current emphasis on education and recruiting for beginning librarians will not lose its vigor.

Obviously, given the saturation of beginning jobs in our field now, and the recent transformation of our traditional mobility to a kind of "homesteading" in upper level jobs, a better balance between entering students in our library schools and the jobs available when they graduate must be found.

Equally important, we must find a way to stop the inflation of qualifications that the job shortage has brought. It is hard to believe the educational requirements that appear in so many job advertisements. We are almost at the point where it takes two master's degrees to work in an academic library, and usually a Ph.D. to run one. Unbelievably, there are librarians calling for a doctor's degree as the qualification to run a public library. The result of this inflated view of job qualifications is to lose talent to other fields with less demanding requirements, while degrading our own library schools and the degrees they offer. Subject specialization may be necessary in some libraries, but they can't be as numerous as the job listings indicate.

Galvin also points out that the professoriate in our field needs new blood. Library school faculties have a good many of the symptoms of middle-age that are seen in the whole field. But it is hard to believe that we'll need all those Ph.D.'s or other "doctors" that are coming out of the schools in the next three to five years. This is particularly true if Galvin's prediction that the presence of practicing librarians involved in continuing education at the schools will bring an infusion of new ideas from the field.

The quality of library research, with some notable exceptions, fits Jesse Shera's description in his essay: " . . . we have spent an inordinate amount of time mathematically and in other ways breaking down open doors."

As a field we must find a way to attract and employ new talent, despite a crushing job shortage. We must be certain, as well, that we are not creating a doctoral pool, the utilization of which will require either the expansion of our already sufficient library education establishment or the inflation of certain job qualifications to require that further degree. Some of this high-level, high cost talent might be employed in meaningful research outside librarianship to find new solutions to long-standing problems.

Finally, we have to be certain that we don't allow our pressure to maintain current practices to force our schools to emphasize occupational training at the expense of theory, the theory that could bring the innovation, experimentation, and change for which we can't find models in existing libraries.

It was difficult to avoid the temptation to create yet another "laundry list" of library problems in this essay. That was not its purpose. The specific problems cited were chosen to illustrate the results of two basic ailments of library middle age: institutional goal displacement, and the experience trap.

To overcome the first there are the hopeful signs of a movement among libraries to restate their purposes and goals, to rewrite their missions. There are new models for service, and in the 23 essays which follow are many more hopeful signs that the profession recognizes the danger it faces when library priorities put internal operating procedures above service.

To free ourselves and our libraries from the experience trap, our 23 authors give you a wealth of new ideas, new perspectives, and they point to specific problems that must be solved in order for us to continue to serve successfully.

While these essays tend to reflect the bleak economic picture currently facing libraries, many see great hope in technology, in new approaches, and in healthy social and political changes ahead.

The future of libraries will depend upon our ability to change with the society, as we always have. It will require tremendous effort to end our obsession with our operating problems and to put our resources into service. But serving society's need to know is our fundamental purpose, and the sooner we get it back on top of the priority list, the more responsive our public and its leaders will be.

The future of libraries will depend upon whether we can extricate them from "the experience trap," attract the new blood and new ideas, and recreate from this middle-aged institution, a new one called the library.

We at LJ are optimistic that libraries and librarians will succeed, and that Library Journal will report the results in its Bicentennial Issue. It will probably be called "The Need To Know."

America was the "China" of the nineteenth century — described, analyzed, promoted and attacked. Thousands of foreign visitors — among them writers, social critics, and artists — took up the challenge of reporting on and judging the new nation. We invite you to accompany them on their journeys, as Addison-Wesley proudly announces publication of. . .

ABROAD IN AMERICA: visitors to the new nation 1776–1914

CO-PUBLISHED WITH THE NATIONAL PORTRAIT GALLERY, SMITHSONIAN INSTITUTION

Here, in a lavishly illustrated volume, are the observations of 33 European, Asian, African, and South American travellers to the United States. The essays have been written by foreign scholars, each discussing a compatriot's journey to the New World, and by American specialists in the cultures of other travellers. Most of the accompanying illustrations will appear in the National Portrait Gallery's Bicentennial Exhibition.

The following accounts, and those of Charles Dickens, Alexis de Tocqueville, Giacomo Puccini, H. G. Wells, and 21 others will thrill modern American readers with their richness and diversity of cross-cultural perspectives:

The marquis de Chastellux, aide-de-camp to Rochambeau, wrote an "Enlightenment" commentary on Revolutionary America.

Edward Wilmot Blyden, a Liberian on a diplomatic mission to Civil War America, wrote of the bitter experience of being Black in a racially tense society.

Mrs. Frances Trollope, in 1834, published an outrageously scurrilous account of American manners, illustrated by the biting sketches of Auguste Hervieu.

Henryk Sienkiewicz, author of Quo Vadis, arrived from Warsaw to scout the possibility of setting up a Utopian colony in California.

José Martí, Cuban poet and revolutionary, vacillated between affection for our democracy and fear of potential imperialism in his reports on the America of the 1880's.

Antonín Dvořák's visit to the United States in the 1890's inspired him to compose several works, among them the New World Symphony.

Hu Shih and Liang Ch'i-ch'ao visited pre-World War I America and came to opposite conclusions about America's relevance to 20th Century China. The two later became famous adversaries in Peking University.

The Papers of JOSEPH HENRY

Vol. II
Edited by Nathan Reingold

The Princeton Years 1832-1846

Joseph Henry was one of the founders of the American scientific community — a pioneer experimental physicist in electricity and magnetism. From the selection of available documents and letters, there emerges — through Reingold's editorial talents — a panorama of the general cultural American scene, as well as Henry's perceptive observations on faculty, student and social life of contemporary Princeton. This, the first of five volumes which will comprise The Princeton Years (the first volume, published last year, delineated The Albany Years), is sure to be of special interest.

Vol. II 536 pages profusely illustrated $30.00
ISBN: 0-87474-164-5 LC: 75-34647

Special Prepublication Offer — a savings of 33 1/3% or more.

Because of their special relevance to librarians, the Smithsonian Institution Press is offering to you the five volumes encompassing The Princeton Years for $100.00, when you order now and pay in advance. The subsequent four volumes will be printed approximately one each year, each priced at $30 or more if bought separately. In addition, if you purchase all five volumes now, you will receive a free copy of Vol. I, The Albany Years. ($15.00)

From a review of Vol. I in Technology and Culture: "It will surely be regarded as an indispensable reference book for the specialist in early 19th-century history of science but will be of interest to those scholars concerned with American social and intellectual history."

There are 2,736 entries in the 3d edition of Anniversaries and Holidays. It is international in scope and includes material on 152 nations. Almost 1,700 entries identify holidays and special days; more than 1,000 list men and women who are honored by nations or professions, including those individuals chosen for the American Hall of Fame twenty-five years after their deaths. Many of the holidays listed are centuries old; others are as new as the Guinea-Bissau Independence Day that was first observed on September 8, 1974. Both fixed and moveable days are included. The introduction includes an essay on the kinds of calendars that affect the timing of holidays and another essay on holidays in history.

A bibliography, consisting of 1,002 titles, serves as an aid in locating background materials on holidays and in planning for their observance. It lists books on the general subject of calendars and the measurement of time, almanacs and dictionaries of days, historic observances and events, and the holy days of the world's religious faiths. Some books focus on specific holidays ranging from Christmas to Woman's Equality Day; others tell how to prepare for special observances: ideas for decorations, crafts, suggestions for food and entertainment, and material for programs. Listings of fixed days included in the text are keyed to the appropriate titles in the bibliography.

More than 40,000 libraries and schools have used the second edition of Anniversaries and Holidays for the past thirty years. The new third edition is even bigger and better than that ALA classic.

The State Government & Libraries

IN NO OTHER PROFESSION is it more important that forecasting and meaningful futuristic explorations be undertaken than in the library profession. Since information is essential to identify the options necessary in productive decision-making, future decision-makers will be dependent upon what is made available to them by the organizers and disseminators of information. To plan adequate information systems for the future, we must encourage the collective mind of the library profession to creatively predict. Predicting even the immediate future is not an easy task. One hundred years ago it was easier to predict what life would be like in 1976 than it is to now predict what life will be like 25 years hence at the beginning of the 21st Century. The continuing geometric rate of change will present us with more differences in the next 25 years than we have seen in the last 100 years.

But our senses do not register the change swirling about us; it is possible to sit in the middle of a modern catastrophe and not know that it is taking place. Old systems and institutions can be wrecked and crumble around us and nobody will bleed visibly as a result of the falling debris. Two agencies, the FBI and CIA, publicly funded with billions of dollars, have mutilated the Bill of Rights and even after their systematic butchering has been exposed, the dazed public seems not to fully understand the nature and implications of this calamity. At this late date, most citizens of the world—including some key government decision-makers—are still unable to comprehend the fact that the world economy has shifted from a gold standard to an oil and grain standard. This lack of awareness persists despite the fact that the information to support this conclusion is clearly and currently before us. We shudder each time the Organization of Petroleum Exporting Countries (OPEC) meets to consider raising the price of oil. On the other hand, we glow with pride when we read that, by providing us with grain to export, our farmers have enabled the United States to end the continuing deficits in its balance of payments. Within a few years, some expensive intelligence study will probably confirm a fact that ought to be self-evident: that the Soviet Union is dumping its gold on world markets while at the same time, it is stockpiling grain.

Guideposts to the future

Some of us must be bold enough to predict future life patterns and styles and the general economic, social, and political environment in which citizens will be immersed. The future for libraries and librarians must be explored in terms of the substance and contents of the service delivered by libraries. Neither technology nor necessary administrative systems are as difficult to forecast as are the nature, scope, and intensity of future information needs. The following represents one attempt to lay out a set of general signposts:

by Major R. Owens

I. The involvement of government in every facet of life will be better understood; in the public's mind political issues will be assigned a higher priority and perhaps even gain equality with employment and business in perceived importance. The erosion of the notion "that government is best which governs least" will be completed as the next 25 years continue to produce massive, complex problems which only governments can handle. Replacing the obsolete laissez-faire myth will be a greater determination to make government govern better by carefully choosing its priorities and concentrating its resources on pivotal issues and needs. The continuing squeeze on scarce resources such as oil, food, and clean air will force citizens of all classes to see political involvement as a life or death, "bread and butter" matter. Such increased involvement will stimulate a demand for more information.

II. Public apathy and helplessness in the face of official corruption and mismanagement will give way to aggressive public vigilance. Many codes of ethics, codes of honor, and even sacred professional oaths have already been discredited. In the face of revelations of systematic corporate bribery and campaign law violations, the shabby Agnew transactions in the White House, the avalanche of Watergate crimes, and other similar shocks, only the naïve continue to trust those public officials they cannot watch. Like the straw bosses in the sweat shops, we have been forced to conclude that "we can only expect what we inspect." Racism and welfare witch hunting are not likely to be indefinitely tolerated as the politicians' coverup for incompetence and lack of vision. Information systems which maximize the ongoing exposure of governmental processes, functions and expenditures will be demanded by a cross section of watchdog groups and the general public. From the Ralph Naders of our society, we will learn more about which facts to search out and how to arrange them to facilitate critical review.

III. A more creative and broader concept of "public interest" will produce pressures which will push the government into more aggressive attempts to influence and shape the mores, tastes, morals, and personal habits of citizens. Official pleas such as "go slow and save gas" and "stop pollution" will increase and citizens will be urged to use fewer electric appliances, to avoid sports and hobbies such as boating and flying which consume extraordinary amounts of fuel, to take fewer pills, to smoke less, to drink less, to eat less. The use of food as a strategic weapon in the cold war will result in subtle forms of food rationing before the end of this decade. Instead of eating for therapy and entertainment the public will be encouraged to find substitutes. Government subsidies for theater, music, and the arts will increase significantly as it is understood that such expenditures are in the national interest. Professions concerned with the prevention of addiction and the rehabilitation of drug addicts, alcoholics, and criminals are already intensely exploring writing, the performing arts, and reading as essential and effective activities in the process of stabilizing and recasting shattered individual lives. Self-evident and time-honored civilizing forces will be recognized as practical necessities. The heretofore ignored fact that records and books are cheaper than meat in the Soviet Union is the kind of matter which hard-boiled government policy makers will be forced to ponder in the future.

IV. Industries designed to satisfy physical needs will reach a saturation point or a point of diminishing returns while new industries designed to satisfy nonphysical needs will expand more rapidly. In addition to the government actions emphasized in point three, swiftmoving economic forces will reshape tastes and habits as well as the products offered by manufacturers, wholesalers, and retailers. Already, plastics and other petroleum based products have become scarcer or prohibitively high in price. The automobile—purchase cost plus operating costs—which consumed a great percentage of American family income has moved beyond the reach of many middle-income budgets. Replacing the unattainable hard goods such as cars, motorboats, and deep freezers will be a wider variety of soft goods, individually satisfying services, new forms of entertainment, and objects that are artistically and intellectually stimulating. Within this emerging context the incomes of dance, music, and karate instructors will rise. How-to-do-it classes, budget magazines, mail order specialties, and book clubs are a few examples of growth industries.

V. Economic internationalism will encourage a rapid expansion of other forms of cross cultural contacts and a premium will be placed on knowledgeability and awareness with respect to social, educational and cultural world affairs. Individuals with only rudimentary knowledge and information who survive and move with ease within the anti-intellectual ghetto that is America will experience personal discomfort and professional hardship as they move through the world community. Traveling colonialists and imperialists had no reason to worry about the reactions and responses of their hosts; however, the international demand for equality is now a reality. Ignorance will not be accepted as an excuse when customs are violated, mores are ridiculed, religious shrines are abused, and national heroes are maligned. At one extreme, travelers who innocently do not know or who stubbornly refuse to understand will experience discomfort and harassment; at the other extreme, ignorance may result in the loss of property, of liberty, or of life. Prolonged contacts, especially among professionals, are likely to replace tourist adventures. The need to know and to be aware is a need which must be met before the voyage begins; the orientation might begin in the local library or information center.

VI. The worship of the false god of the formal classroom will end and numerous forms of nonformal education will blossom and grow. Both the education capitalists—school construction contractors, classroom furniture manufacturers, education equipment makers—and the education laborers—teachers, custodians, and administrators—are the high priests promoting the continued worship of the false god of the formal classroom. The public has paid dearly for its naïve sins but a point of diminishing returns has now been reached. The high cost of construction and maintenance and the high cost of ever rising salaries has produced a taxpayer's revolt which should not be dismissed as mere miserliness. Does education have to cost so much? Is the classroom the most efficient vehicle for delivering instruction? As in any other religion the dangerous point is the time when blind believers begin to ask questions. Public decision-makers are already cutting the investment in formal education. Librarians and others engaged in nonformal education must offer a blueprint and prospectus to guide them into new investments with greater yields. One obvious possible venture is the forging of a partnership between educational mass media and libraries.

VII. A bulging unemployed discontented middle class coupled with a growing class of educated poor who are especially knowledgeable about the processes of government will force the modification of many aspects of the present system. These two mutations of the regular classes will make common cause and provide a cutting edge for accelerated change. Whether the change will be revolutionary or evolutionary will depend on the reaction of the power structure to the pressure organized and focused by these have-nots. While their primary concern will be immediate economic gains for themselves, it is not likely that they can be accommodated by the "creaming" process which has worked in the past. The heterogeneity of the two groups and the rate at which their ranks are swelling combined with their knowledge of how to use information as a weapon will decrease the possibility that they can be "bought off" without making fundamental changes. One demand will be that greater stockpiles of information be placed at their disposal.

VIII. Hunger for information will give birth to many new forms of information management organizations and a polyglot collection of information specialists will replace the existing sluggish library profession as the dominant force in what we presently call librarianship. In addition to an increased number of public interest law firms and specialized advocacy agencies, public interest and advocacy libraries and information centers will be created in greater numbers. Such organizations will be staffed at very low costs by recruits from the ranks of the unemployed middle class and the educated poor. Although private funds and volunteer staffing will facilitate the startup of the public interest libraries, both the founders and their constituencies will later pressure successfully for various forms of public funding. Where established libraries are flexible and accept new styles in staffing as well as new patterns of interaction with their clientele, they will retain their roles as primary information management agencies. Regrettably, the present rate and quality of attitudinal change among libraries and within the profession indicates that for the overwhelming majority of the profession the necessary flexibility will not be forthcoming. More aggressive and creative information workers and specialists who are oriented toward concrete goals and objectives will replace the unimaginative and vague traditionalists who have for so long allowed a service vacuum to deepen. While certified library school graduates may continue to lose jobs, the principles of good librarianship will gain greater respect and be implemented by a new breed.

IX. In the world search for the best system or systems, concern with the principles of management science and administrative know-how will replace the present preoccupation with economic and political ideology. The problems of bureaucrats, technocrats, and managers all over the world are more alike than they are different. In this century, each major ideology, while striving to demonstrate its ability to achieve major goals, has stumbled on complex administrative obstacles. Man is not naturally an administering animal. Effective management of any endeavor requires a constant ongoing effort, the creation and maintenance of a tension which runs counter to the natural instincts of the species. Obvious extremes and short-sighted paths of least resistance are more in harmony with man's basic nature and therefore have great appeal. However, one prerequisite to the creation of a just society is the development of relevant, productive, and well-managed institutions. Since we have now begun to understand that changes related to religions, economic systems, or political structures have limited impact unless they are competently administered, more attention is now being focused on management science and administrative know-how. Interwoven with the increased involvement of government in all aspects of life and the increased public vigilance against corruption and incompetence there will be the continuing quest for ways to better perform complex public tasks at the lowest possible costs. How to "manage it" will cease to be the concern of a small band of experts and arouse a public interest similar to the enthusiasm of the how to "do-it" movement related to physical and mechanical tasks.

"... a polyglot collection of information specialists will replace the existing sluggish library profession as the dominant force in what we presently call librarianship"

X. In the United States, federal structure, national institutions, and agencies are likely to specialize more in the areas of planning, evaluation, and enforcement; local and city powers are likely to diminish while state powers will expand to the point where they have the greatest and most immediate impact on the lives of citizens. National governmental management reforms following patterns set by the private corporate world have already dramatically altered federal, state, and city relationships and the trend will continue. Richard Nixon's revenue sharing and other related decentralization policies were not his individual idiosyncrasies; they were management ideas whose time had come. The design which treats the central government in Washington as if it was a corporation headquarters and the state and local governments as if they were profit centers is a construct which is likely to be more efficient and effective than the old structure with its swollen central bureaucracies. At the other end of the spectrum in both geography and ideology, the Soviet Union has implemented a massive decentralization of its industry. The Chinese commune is the decentralization principle carried still further. In the United States, as the federal government divests itself of most of its operational duties and responsibilities, it is delegating new powers to the states. The complexity of modern government is such that, except for the ten largest American cities, local governments do not have the capacity to assume the reassigned responsibilities. Only the states have the resources needed to develop the sophisticated systems needed to complement and interlock with the federal management systems. While California is presently the only state with a full-time legislature, the need for more decisions about increasingly complex matters will result in the development of full-time legislatures within a majority of the states. Local city and county decision-makers are already discovering that they are unable to solve many of their most pressing problems, the spillover of the impact of their actions into neighboring jurisdictions requires the intervention of the broader authority which is the state. State government will assume the dominant role in the decision-making which most directly touches our daily lives.

It can readily be seen that these are assumptions which take progress and forward movement for granted. An opposing scenario for the future might forecast a nation conquered by galloping fascism, a nation of "information literates" who only want information resources which allow them to perform their occupation better. By the year 2000, in exchange for law and order, to escape the complexities of modern democracy, and to secure personal peace of mind, all rights to participate in public decision-making will have been surrendered to "Big Brothers." The unemployed middle class and the educated poor would find themselves in secret concentration camps and radiation chambers, the victims of a "final solution." Management science and information systems would be placed at the command of an international elite class whose only concern would be to make their systems of repression more efficient.

While we reject this forecast of doom, we respect the fact that it could be based on current situations and trends which make its arguments credible. But not by accident are the ten assumptions stated above permeated with optimism. It is the optimism of those who have a clear and steady gaze focused on the limitations of humankind and the monstrous obstacles ahead, but who, nevertheless, press forward in the belief that their wholehearted participation in the struggle will make their predictions of progress come true.

Against the backdrop of these general assumptions state support for libraries in the next 25 years may now be discussed more specifically. Since information needs have been stressed, it will prove useful to first define information and describe some chief characteristics or elements of information. Secondly, a sketch of how information might "flow" in a model state level information system will be set forth. And finally, a forecast of the impact of such a model state sponsored service in the year 2000 will be attempted. It must be noted that throughout the course of this presentation, one further assumption is being made: that where productive and practical information services are developed, adequate constituency and official support will be automatic.

A problem which is not fully visible but constantly impedes discussions of the information function within libraries is the problem of definition. An agreement to speak the same language would greatly enhance the effort to develop adequate information services. Rather than repeat in slightly different words what this author has already said before, the following section has been taken from an article entitled "The Information Function—A Theoretical Basis for the Development of Information Networks and Centers" to be published in the January/April 1976 issue of the Drexel Library Quarterly. The issue will be a special one entitled "Information and Referral Services in the Public Library" edited by Dr. Miriam Braverman.

Defining information

After citing the fact that information scientists are reluctant to try and define "information," Faibisoff and Ely, in a commissioned paper on Information and Information Needs offered their own operational definition: "Information is a symbol or a set of symbols which has the potential for meaning."[1] In the same paper it was

"The design which treats the central government in Washington as if it were a corporation headquarters and the state and local governments as if they were profit centers is a construct which is likely to be more efficient and effective than the old structure with its swollen central bureaucracies" noted that a study of 39 definitions of information science included only eight definitions of information and that none of these eight definitions had any common element. One should not minimize the difficulty of defining the word or concept of information; however, fear of being vanquished in logistical jostling should also not paralyze us and prevent the offering of a definition more workable than the one stated above.

Information is a record of phenomena observed or decisions made. The record may merely be the impression on the mind of an individual or it may be an elaborate array of data stored in a computer. A tree in a forest burning as a result of lightning is a phenomenon which becomes information only when a human being sights it or a planted instrument records the occurrence. A decision made by a mayor or a governor at breakfast is information even before it is announced. Information is not synonymous with fact or truth. Information may reduce uncertainty or it may promote confusion.

That decisions made by individuals may be classified as information is an assumption which should be examined more closely. We readily accept the notion that information can always be communicated; however, a contention that almost everything that is communicated is information will be challenged. An eccentric on a street corner proclaiming the end of the world is communicating a decision he has made; however, most listeners label it as misinformation or incorrect information and ignore him. The same eccentric in a crowded theater yelling "fire" is taken seriously and most of the audience will act first to evacuate the building and then later check the accuracy of the information. The example is a bit extreme; however, it is not unrelated to what happens when bureaucrats and public officials proclaim food shortages or oil shortages. Although common sense instructs us to trust the official pronouncements and accept without question the massive amounts of supporting data they are able to manipulate, we often find that after the hysteria dissipates, months and years later, a closer and more thorough examination indicates that the self-evident true information was an elaborate fabrication. In time the voices of the doubters and dissenters who questioned the official positions become accepted as the generators of the "correct" information.

Elements of information

Despite the fact that it makes the task of managing information more difficult, all viewpoints from all sources are part of the ongoing information output and premature judgments with respect to what should be excluded because it is incorrect, inaccurate, or unreliable should not be made by librarians or other information managers. Our focus should instead be on the achievement of a better understanding of certain key elements of information: public significance, value and level.

Public significance

All information is potentially significant and a comprehensive, all inclusive system which gives equal attention to all of the information being generated represents the ideal; however, for practical working purposes we must recognize that we are light years away from such an ideal. Very real limitations on our resources and capacity for managing information make it necessary to be selective and act in terms of such concepts as public significance. Some considerations determining public significance are:

1) The number and categories of people affected by the phenomena or decisions.

2) The degree to which citizens are affected. Is it a matter of life and death, necessity or convenience?

3) The duration of the problem.

4) The immediacy of the impact and the possibility of escalation.

5) The capacity to act possessed by the generator of information.

We must learn how to more rapidly identify items which have public significance and then we must understand that the only truly adequate information system is the system which is designed to provide access to everything that is recorded concerning that item. Every problem or subject has its own information milieu or environment—statistics, data, pronouncements, laws, rules, etc.—and the goal must be to expose as much of that environment to scrutiny as possible.

Value

Closely related to the concept of public significance is the notion of value. The value of information is not absolute but relative. Value is determined primarily by the nature of and the situation of the consumer of information. Information that has public significance will of necessity be of great value to large numbers of consumers; however, all information that has value for individuals is not publicly significant. For the one individual on a bus tour who is allergic to the pollen from apple blossoms, the fact that the road ahead passes through an apple orchard is information of great value while it seems trivial and irrelevant to all others. The announcement that the President of the United States had decided merely to consider the possibility of imposing a tax on gasoline would be information with public significance for millions of people. For the commuter considering the possibility of joining a car pool; for the owner of a small trucking firm; for the businessman considering the purchase of stocks in an oil refinery; for all of these the information also has value. The consequences of the decisions they make or postpone may be quantitatively or qualitatively measured.

Understanding the concept of value is of primary importance in satisfying group and individual information needs. As it becomes more specific and focuses more on specific concerns information acquires value. Formats for the delivery of information should be determined primarily by the nature of the perceived value of the information to the consumer. Will the information be of value in making a household management decision, in launching a campaign to change public policy or in formulating a major business or industry decision? Food prices are a matter having great public significance; however, the local housewives are not interested in information on Department of Agriculture policies. Members of the local school board want statistics, forecasts, and projections which support their effort to gain greater federal subsidies for the school lunch program. The local food wholesalers association wants copies of confidential newsletters which discuss internal developments within the food industry and the government agencies which influence food pricing policies. Purpose and manner of utilization are important determinants of value.

Level

For information to meet a need and acquire value, it must be provided in the appropriate format or at the proper level. Information exists on a continuum from the simple to the complex; from the current output to that which has been sifted, edited, time-tested, and scientifically proven. The fact-sheet, press release, pamphlet, position paper, magazine article, government regulations, scholarly treatise, book, television documentary, slide show, film, etc. are all physical manifestations of this continuum. The needs of target populations serviced by libraries and information centers are likely to be more homogeneous with respect to the levels of information needed than with respect to the subject or category of information needed. Training and specialization in the processes of transforming and translating information into needed levels and formats may be as important as training with respect to subject content.

From the discussion above, one can easily ascertain that the static systems of Dewey and the Library of Congress are not suitable for tracking and organizing access to this kind of knowledge. Not the subject but the source becomes the primary factor. The generators of information and their capacity to act, their authority to impose their decisions, the resources at their command which allow them to influence other decisions, their potential for having an impact on the lives of so many; these generators are the primary elements which must be considered. We must first determine how information about their decisions moves from the generators to library users.

The state-level information system

The definition of information implies that there can be two types of generators of information: those who observe phenomena, and those who make decisions. Scientists (social as well as natural), scholars, engineers, accountants and state police are examples of groups who observe phenomena. Governors, legislators, appointed officials, such as commissioners, political party leaders, and judges are examples of groups who make decisions. At this point it might be useful to note what most librarians are aware of: the fact that those who observe phenomena have developed better information systems. The flow of information among scientists, scholars, police organizations, and the like is a well developed operation; libraries, particularly academic and special, greatly facilitate this flow. Although there is room for improvement of service to the observers of phenomena, this discussion will focus primarily on the neglected decision-makers whose information either flows in a crude and haphazard manner or does not flow at all.

At the apex within each state, decisions made by governors, legislators, and state judges will have a potential impact on the lives of every citizen within the state. An adequate information system must guarantee that decisions made by these officials must be communicated accurately, rapidly, and widely throughout the state. Although most state legislatures have instituted adequate systems for information control from the time a bill is introduced to the time it is signed into law, similar calendars and indexes do not cover the speeches, pronouncements, declarations, and executive orders of the governors and related executives. Judicial decisions, because they are processed on the assumption that only members of the legal profession are interested, experience the least effective information flow.

The legislative grid

Since legislatures have the best managed information systems, it would be useful to examine their process and its implications for the development of state level information services. Each year thousands of bills are introduced and filed for the consideration of the lawmakers. In every state legislative body, many more bills are filed than will be passed and become law. A majority of those filed will not even be debated. But bills are filed by legislators because they wish to display before their constituency their positions, philosophies, and proposed solutions for certain issues, problems, and concerns. Every bill represents some legislator's perception of what must be done about certain expressed needs, vested interests, and personal concerns that have been communicated to him. Thus, all the bills introduced by all of the legislators represent a mirror or index of the current practical concerns and even dreams and aspirations of the active and communicating citizenry of that state. Of course the needs of the inactive and noncommunicating segments of the populace will not be reflected.

Legislation that is debated and voted on represents a further distillation of the collective current needs of the citizenry. Only matters which a significant number of legislators agree upon will be debated and therefore bills reaching this stage must have coalition or consensus support. Legislators take action because they believe large numbers favor action or a powerful minority or powerful concentrated vested interest demands action. At this point, power factors are introduced which cause the actions taken to be no longer simply a reflection of the concerns of the state citizenry; nevertheless, what emerges is still the best available barometer of the collective current priorities. And finally, those bills which pass the legislature and are signed into law are indicators of the state of the state's democratic process. Most laws represent the will of the majority of the voters; however, many represent the skill and power of established vested interest groups. The greater the percentage of the laws which cater to vested interests, the lower is the quality of democracy within the state.

As one of the guideposts above explained, in the future we can expect greater public vigilance and demand for information. Librarians will find that it is not difficult to assist the public in monitoring the legislative sequence outlined above. Legislative indexes summarize each bill that is filed. As bills are brought to the floor for debate they are listed on calendars; as bills are transmitted to governors they are listed by the indexing service and when they are vetoed or signed into law they are listed again. These reference and information tools are already in place.

"State government will assume the dominant role in the decision-making which most directly touches our daily lives"

The executive grid

For the all important departments of state government, decisions and actions may not be followed with such ease. Every law must be implemented, administered, or enforced by some unit of the executive branch of government. Laws are usually compact statements spelling out only the most vital and basic matters. Administering departments, usually headed by commissioners at the state level, must interpret the laws and spell out the details necessary for implementation or enforcement. Every major law thus generates many pages and sometimes volumes of regulations which are designed to interpret, explain, and facilitate the administration of the law. Involved in the process are executive orders and memos from the governor to the commissioner or other administrators, internal agency memoranda, and regulations and notices issued to operating agencies and the general public. It should be noted that at the federal level, The Federal Register encompasses all such matters of significance. Most states do not have a comparable register.

At the operations level, where state government action has the most direct impact upon the population, the mechanisms for recording decisions is muddled and therefore the flow of information is hopelessly haphazard. Internal manuals, handbooks, and annual reports eventually record important decisions; however, the time lag is so great that the public cannot use these materials for ongoing decision-making. In the absence of a systematic and smooth flow of public information, informal communication processes take over and lobbyists, expensive attorneys, and consultant firms become the costly primary vehicles for obtaining information. To correct this situation adequate indexes, registers, and other records must be developed.

The judicial grid

The judicial branch of government is quite thorough and accurate in its record keeping processes and the legal profession has developed a wide range of tools to facilitate the flow of information to the legal profession. Someday a long overdue study will show how good lawyers are always good librarians. No other profession manages information better than the legal profession. But the flow of information remains within the professional circles. At very little cost, librarians may plug this legal information system into a larger public information network.

Accuracy, thoroughness, and comprehensiveness represent only the beginning of an adequate information system. For all publicly significant matters there must be dissemination strategies. Involved in the formulation of such strategies are questions relating to scope of need, intensity of need, and longevity of need. Not all matters of concern to the legal profession need to be switched into the public grid. And not all executive orders and legislative items will be of use in all parts of any state. Scope is concerned with how widespread and where the need is. A bill which proposes a new state-wide tax should have information about it distributed to every information outlet within the state while a bill mandating a minimum size for city sidewalks would require exposure only in urban areas. The numerous pieces of personal, small group, and locality legislation would be of interest only to those immediately affected.

Intensity of need

Questions raised with respect to the intensity of the information need would assist in determining the number of copies of materials to be disseminated. For a limited period of time how many users are likely to request the item? For tax matters, the intensity will obviously be great at all service units.

Intensity may also be easily gauged when decisions concern a particular locality; anticipation of a heavy demand from the citizens of that locality is a logical assumption. Most information items, however, do not fit so easily into the obvious extremes. Judgments must be made by librarians or other information managers as to whether or not there is an intense need and, if so, where that degree of need exists. Each time both scope of need and intensity of need are accurately predicted, the information system scores a triumph with its constituency. State support for libraries depends on the number of times this constituency stands up to cheer for its library services.

Longevity of need

Longevity of need is the consideration which the conventional wisdom of the profession has trained us to understand best. Librarians generally avoid ephemeral materials while seeking resources which have "lasting" value. An offshoot of this concern is the mistaken notion that current information or lasting information in ephemeral formats has no significance in meeting information needs. This conventional thinking refuses to recognize the rapid pace of change; matters which appear ephemeral today may suddenly acquire great public significance. For example: the mechanisms of the government bond market including the daily quotations aroused little public interest before the New York City default possibility became widely known in the fall of 1975. Longevity of need is often not self-evident; however, some items such as monthly and annual legislative indexes instead of daily legislative indexes and calendars belong in reference libraries where there should be no concern with intensity of need. Local service units need copies of a governor's "state of the state" message a few hours after it is delivered; however, reference collections (where there are adequate local service units) should wait for the quarterly or annual compilations of state documents.

Timeliness of need

Timeliness of need may be added as another factor; however, we have already stated that information is needed to assist in the process of decision-making. Information that is available when it is needed for decision-making is timely information. Most of this discussion is concerned with the provision of better and more relevant library service by improving the "flow" of information to insure that it arrives when it is needed for decision-making.

"Dissemination cataloging" which predicts scope, intensity, and longevity must be added to descriptive cataloging. At the source, where the information is generated, librarians must forecast patterns of utilization. Statewide distribution systems using buses, trains, planes, vans, trucks, and other vehicles must guarantee the delivery of materials as designated and within timeframes which guarantee that they will be available for decision-making.

We are discussing substance, not form; the better utilization of existing library networks, not the invention of new ones. The proposition is that we pour new wine, information for decision-making, into old bottles. We are very much aware of the fact that model library systems and networks already exist in various states. Our concern is with the "model flow" of information through such "model systems."

Two important studies have provided concise but thorough statements on the state of state library systems and networks. Genevieve M. Casey, in a commissioned paper released in 1974, offers a brilliant summary of the problems and prospects of the public library in the network mode. She pinpoints the problems and prospects for intertype library cooperation using several state networks as examples.[2]

A second commissioned study by Rodney P. Lane entitled The Role of the State in the Development of Public Library Services provides a thorough history, current review and analysis and recommendations for the future.[3]

The state role in 2000 AD

For most areas of the country the hypothesis that in the future adequate library service can be maintained only through the heavy participation of the federal and state government is an inescapable truth. Although the greatest share of the financing must come from the federal treasury, the major policy-making authority and the responsibility for setting day-to-day operating standards

"The State department of libraries should receive a priority placement comparable to the state department of health" will belong to the states. State-sponsored library service including some overall state coordinating agency and a tighter supervision of the intertype networks and the public library systems is the wave of the future. In the year 2000, the quality of the library services we enjoy will primarily be the result of state governmental actions.

In the year 2000 what will be the impact of this state sponsored library service on our lives? How will it enhance greater occupational effectiveness? How will it increase the level of public awareness and improve the decision-making capacity of the general citizenry? How will it improve the quality of life and foster greater personal satisfaction and happiness?

Information for work

Occupational effectiveness, 25 years from now, for an increasingly greater variety and range of jobs will depend more and more on the utilization of information. Information literates, defined by Paul G. Zurkowski, president of the Information Industry Association, as "people trained in the application of information resources to their work," will maintain a competitive edge in all types of employment from automobile mechanics and salesmen to legislators and corporation executives. State-sponsored library services must do everything possible to maximize the availability of information resources for all categories of workers. Just as states presently spend considerable sums of money on plants and machinery to woo and hold industries, in the future information resources will be advertised as a major asset of the state.

Public with private

To increase the availability of information resources for occupational effectiveness, states and the public treasury need not assume direct responsibility. While state planning must identify gaps and seek to correct them, linkages with private information resources will prove to be far more effective and less costly than attempts to assume total responsibility. Cooperative agreements including contracts and subsidies for private special libraries will permit the state to offer all existing resources to all workers. Present taboos against mixing public and private efforts are superstitions which should be buried forever. Financing for the provision of information resources may be arranged on the basis of the same hard-boiled, practical considerations which govern the offering of plants and equipment to new industries. Where the state does not anticipate a return in terms of increased employment for residents and/or greater revenue for the state, a system of charges must be developed to make user workers and industries pay most of their own costs.

Flow of information was discussed above in terms of a direct flow down from governmental units. There is another equally important cross flow from specialized industries and institutions which are both public and private. To tie all of these resources together and facilitate the work of the information literates, the information industry will prove to be a growth industry. Just as most professionals, agencies, businesses, and corporations presently retain ongoing legal counsel, in the future, information consultants or brokers will become a standard support service. As needed, workers will be able to place their orders for information and know that expert information technicians will go to work to extract answers from the state service networks and systems or from the national grid which makes available federal, regional, and other state resources. Many of the unemployed middle class and the educated poor will find jobs within this information industry and new specialists will develop who will have a great impact upon the stagnant library profession.

Information for democracy

Beyond information literacy for greater work effectiveness and efficiency, information literacy is needed to guarantee the survival of democratic institutions. All men are created equal but voters with information resources are in a position to make more intelligent decisions than citizens who are information illiterates. The application of information resources to the process of decision-making to fulfill civic responsibilities is a vital necessity.

Within the past three years startling events have illustrated this necessity. Two men selected by the national electorate as President and Vice President had to be driven from office. We have learned that several presidents have encouraged the development of assassination plots against foreign leaders; we have learned simultaneously that the same apparatus established for foreign cloak-and-dagger operations has been intensely focused on our own citizens. We have been shocked to discover that the elected officials of the nation's largest city have allowed New York City to drift into fiscal insolvency. Against the backdrop of events of this kind a revolt of the voters and taxpayers is in order. Instead of revolution, however, an evolutionary process is in motion. On the one hand, distrust of public officials leading to the rejection of propositions, amendments, and bond authorizations recommended by those officials is one manifestation of this process. On the other hand, the clamor for open government, access to all official documents, and public admission to committee hearings and other governmental proceedings represents a more positive reflection of the process of evolving toward participatory democracy.

Several of the guideposts set forth above are closely related to this problem. Increased vigilance of the citizenry, greater awareness of the "bread and butter" implications of political decisions, the applications of management science which results in greater decentralization of government; these developments are predicted and an accompanying fallout of information needs is also predicted. Most of the examples cited in the discussion on the flow of information are related to the "information substance" needed to satisfy such important civic and political needs. Much more can be done if obsolete attitudes are laid aside and imaginations are stretched.

Quality of life

And finally, let us consider the quality of life, that elusive concept which sociologists are presently laboring to measure in more concrete terms. How will state supported library services encourage and support the attainment of greater personal satisfaction and happiness in the year 2000? The suicide rate, mental illness rate, alcoholism and drug addiction rate, rate of homicide within families—these are some of the concrete measures of the absence of personal satisfaction and happiness. Sociologists are less comfortable with concepts which represent positive indications of satisfaction and happiness. Creativity and productivity rates, civic participation rates, sexual satisfaction rate, parent/child harmony rates, the rate of assertion of basic human rights against occupational or social repression—these are a few of the barometers which require more attention in discussions attempting to describe the quality of life.

I have stated that, for various practical reasons, government would become more involved in attempts to influence personal tastes and attitudes. The need to conserve energy and food are two of the primary motivating factors readily understood and accepted. However, as the effort to influence behavior moves toward the need to save individuals from themselves, many more detailed and continuing dialogues are needed among the citizenry. There is no discussion more profound than the exploration of the limits of free will and the rights of individual decision-making. Does an individual have a right to be an alcoholic, a masochist, or a glutton? Does a drug addict have the same rights as an alcoholic? Should priority be assigned to altering the behavior of persons obsessed with accumulating millions of dollars or to those persons who are obsessed with sexual gratification?

Not only are long and intense discussions needed among citizens and between citizens and their governments but abundant information resources and suitable forum formats are also needed. A pivotal role in the process of searching for ways to improve the quality of life belongs to the library. Despite the fact that there are many questions still to be answered, it must be remembered that there are a few accepted tools for improving the quality of life. Reading makes the beast more reasonable, art stimulates his visual and mechanical imagination and music soothes the beast. Culture is a practical component of modern life and decision-makers who heretofore labeled culture as a luxury have begun to reconsider their narrow view of life. It is now generally admitted that the rehabilitation of a criminal or an addict is impossible unless his cultural values and outlook are considered. Just as the rehabilitation of criminals, addicts, and the mentally ill is a responsibility of state government, the prevention of these diseases is also a state function. Far-reaching and aggressively implemented state cultural programs are not luxuries but necessities for a high quality of life prevents disease and encourages mental health. The state department of libraries should receive a priority placement comparable to the state department of health.

Toward satisfied users

The rapid rate of change within the next 25 years will produce a society as different from now as the present is from the society of 100 years ago. Social, political, and cultural changes will be far more significant than technological changes. Within our democratic society, there is a crucial information deficit which must be met to prevent most of our democratic institutions and governmental processes from defaulting. State governments must now assume responsibility for library services which help to meet this deficit by adding to traditional library functions the responsibility for providing information for decision-making. Model systems and networks already exist. The problem is not with the form and the channels; the need is to provide substance that satisfies users. Each time the constituency stands up to cheer for services received, adequate state support for libraries is closer to being guaranteed.

Send for descriptive literature

We never promise you a prizewinner, or a headliner. And yet...

In 1975 alone an extraordinary six Basic titles were nominated for National Book Awards. And two of them — Anarchy, State, and Utopia by Robert Nozick and The Interpretation of Schizophrenia by Silvano Arieti, M.D. — came away winners. These prizewinning authors join a distinguished roster that includes Nobel Laureates Sir John Hicks, Sir MacFarlane Burnet and Niko Tinbergen.

Headliners? 98% of Basic's most recent trade list won featured review space in major media; and the majority of our titles are recommended by key library media. Take Victor R. Fuchs' challenging and timely, Who Shall Live? This work generated front-page reviews in both The New York Times Book Review and Washington Post Book World, notices in leading newspapers and magazines, plus extensive discussion among policymakers in Washington, D.C.

At Basic we really don't start out looking for prizes or headliners. Our only desire is to publish the best — those few books in any field that ought to be published, if our society is to be free and informed. Here are a dozen such titles. We're not planning on winning any prizes. Or making front-page news.

SURVIVAL OF THE FITTEST

It's a tough world out there. If a library book is going to survive being read by children—being dropped, thrown, bent backwards, stood on, etc.—it's going to have to be tough, too.

Bound To Stay Bound Books are strong, because they're library prebound to withstand the use and abuse of over one hundred young readers. BTSB Books last up to five times longer than ordinary books, yet cost as little as 5¢ per circulation.

For a strong, healthy library collection, send for our free service brochure and catalog listing over 24,000 in-stock titles.

the future of federal library support

LIBRARIES are so familiar to Americans that we tend to take their facilities and services for granted. Whether for information, knowledge or pleasure, it is often to libraries that we turn. Libraries are the custodians of the heritage both of our nation and our civilization.

Today, however, our libraries are in trouble. Their financial support has not been enough to keep up with their rising costs. The recent predicament of some of our metropolitan libraries illustrate the problem.

The Chicago Public Library faced the possibility of a $1.5 million deficit by the end of 1975. This dismaying prospect appeared despite the efforts of the library to cut costs by putting a freeze on hiring, suspending new book purchases and reducing operating hours. Only a special pledge of funds from municipal officials saved the situation.

In Cleveland, purchases of new books for the city's libraries have been frozen for several months at a stretch, and in New York City, where the fiscal crisis certainly aggravated but did not cause the problems of the municipal library system, operating hours throughout its network of branches have been slashed in half.

Causes of the crisis

There are several reasons for the financial difficulties confronting libraries, and they are political as well as economic. First, of course, is inflation, which stalks libraries as indeed every other institution of our society. Library materials and library resources are not immune from the sharp rises in the cost of living.

But there is another factor peculiar to libraries that has helped put them in their present plight. It is this: not everyone uses a library nor does everyone use the same library throughout a lifetime of learning and work, yet the library must be there—ably staffed and well-stocked—for those who need it and when they need it. And the library cannot await a request before obtaining an item. The library must be ready to serve its patrons whenever they need service.

Most libraries are economical in their operations. They cooperate with each other to keep costs at a minimum. They borrow and lend their materials among themselves so that almost any user of virtually any library can obtain the book or journal or map or print or tape he requests.

Because the demands of library users are so different, we need a wide variety of libraries. The public library typically contains several specialized departments to serve its various constituencies—adults, children, businessmen, craftsmen and technicians—and to provide a diversity of materials—pictures and books, recordings and periodicals.

School and college libraries must meet the demands of both students and teachers while college and university libraries must provide the resources for scholarship and research.

"The Nixon administration recommended an abrupt end to federal support for libraries for fiscal 1974 and only a modest appropriation for the following year. The Ford Administration has followed the same policy of malign neglect"

There are, in addition, hospital and medical school and law libraries, libraries of professional and scientific societies, and the libraries of larger business firms and trade and industry organizations.

As the number of people using these libraries grows, they must strain their resources to provide the services the users want. In America, we have a citizenry far more highly educated than that of any other major nation. Our insistence on good library services is evidence of our commitment to education. The thirst for knowledge is rarely quenched, and the more formal education a person has, librarians assure us, the more informal education he seeks at the library and elsewhere.

So the greater numbers who are using libraries are one factor in the present financial difficulty facing these institutions. Another element is the rising output of the materials that libraries must make available to their users. Every year, more books are published; more scientific journals issued; more newspapers, magazines, films and recordings produced—and in more and more languages.

So not only are there many more people who want to know, and need to know, what may be in the libraries, but there is vastly more material for them to peruse and consult.

These two factors, rising numbers of users and rising output of materials, combine to increase the costs of libraries. The third factor causing financial trouble for libraries is chiefly political, not economic. It is the question of how the burgeoning costs of library services are to be met, that is, where publicly supported, by what units or levels of government; where the funds are private, a similar problem exists: from whom will they come? Libraries need help from a variety of sources, and government, in particular, whether federal, local or state, must not shirk its responsibility to give that support.

Originally, like most other public services in this country, libraries were almost entirely a responsibility of local government and private philanthropy. Libraries were at first endowed by societies of their patrons and later by public spirited donors. Larger units of government then joined in support of libraries. The states gave aid both through public schools and the land-grant universities as well as directly to the state libraries.

The federal role

Aside from the development and maintenance of the Library of Congress, the National Agricultural Library, and the National Library of Medicine, the federal government did not until relatively recently support public libraries, school libraries, or college and university libraries.

The Subcommittee on Select Education, which I have the honor to chair in the House of Representatives, has overseen the development of the Library Services and Construction Act, which has significantly strengthened our public libraries, and the Committee on Education and Labor has fostered improved school and college and university libraries through provisions of the Elementary and Secondary Education Act, the Higher Education Act, and other measures.

The Rural Library Services Act was enacted in 1956 after a decade of debate in Congress. In 1964 this statute was broadened to become the present Library Services and Construction Act. Since then the law has helped over 12,000 public libraries to buy books, pay salaries and operating expenses, and put up buildings. In time, through the Elementary and Secondary Education Act, the Higher Education Acts, the Medical Library Assistance Act, and other legislation, Congress affirmed a measure of national responsibility for school and college libraries as well as libraries of other kinds.

The Library Services and Construction Act has been important in extending library service to special groups such as the handicapped, the elderly, the hospitalized, people in rural areas, the bilingual, and the disadvantaged. The Act also earmarks assistance for metropolitan libraries that serve as regional resource centers. LSCA funds have enabled communities throughout the country to build new libraries and remodel outdated ones, and the law has also encouraged cooperation among libraries in different states.

My subcommittee has just completed hearings on legislation to extend the Library Services and Construction Act, and I anticipate that Congress will act on the measure early this year.

Since 1965, the Elementary and Secondary Education Act has helped over 60,000 public and private schools obtain textbooks and other library resources. Beginning last year the new Library and Learning Resources program, the ESEA title relating to school libraries, replaced three existing categorical programs which provided grants for school library resources, the acquisition of education equipment, and guidance, counseling and testing. The new consolidated program, Title IV-B of ESEA, is designed to provide local school districts more flexibility in the use of federal education funds for these purposes.

When any new program takes effect, there is uncertainty about how it will work. I know that although many state and local school officials, librarians, counselors, and administrators hope that the consolidated Libraries and Learning Resources program will prove successful, they are apprehensive about various aspects of it. We in Congress will be watching closely as the new program takes effect, and we intend to keep informed on how it affects elementary and secondary education throughout the country.

The Higher Education Act, which has supported college libraries and library training and research for the past ten years, assists a diversity of services and programs, including minority group candidates for doctorates in librarianship, students in adult basic education classes through public library extension, surveys of the library needs of prisons, and exploration of the public library approach to nontraditional study.

Although provision of public library services is still preeminently a local and state responsibility, as the description of this federal legislation shows, libraries are more than a local or state concern. Suburbanites use city libraries, people travel across state lines to get to libraries. These are simply facts of modern life. We cannot escape their implications by asserting the traditional lines of government responsibility. To assure an equitable provision of library services, Congress has been sharing their costs with the state and local governments.

Although federal dollars represent only about seven percent of the funds public libraries spend, that money is a great stimulus for expanded and innovative services. Bookmobiles, store-front libraries, talking books, educational films and games for nonreaders, and interstate library cooperative systems have all benefited from federal support.

Malign neglect

Despite the modest amounts of federal funds spent for libraries in recent years, the Administrations of President Nixon and President Ford have questioned whether the federal government should assist libraries at all. The budgets submitted by the White House in the past few years have proposed drastically smaller, and even no, appropriations for major library programs.

The Nixon Administration recommended an abrupt end to federal support for libraries for fiscal 1974 and only a modest appropriation for the following year. Ford Administration officials have followed the same policy of malign neglect. They have insisted that other activities bear a higher priority, or, alternatively, that revenue sharing is the answer to the problems of libraries and other community institutions.

Indeed, the history of revenue sharing shows that very little of the money goes to libraries. In fiscal year 1973, almost one quarter of the revenue sharing funds spent by state and local governments went for police and fire protection while libraries received only 0.7 percent of the money. Because most of these funds have gone for one-time expenditures such as capital improvements, revenue sharing dollars have not replaced the federal money that enables libraries to provide services.

Although the Administration has tried to cut federal assistance for libraries, Congress has rejected these efforts. That the last two Presidents have demonstrated such marked hostility to support for libraries underscores the importance of the White House Conference on Library and Information Services, which was authorized in legislation developed by my subcommittee.

The White House Conference

The delegates to this White House Conference, which so far President Ford has refused to call, should address the issues that challenge libraries now: the potential of new technology; cooperation between libraries; library services to special groups; and training for librarians. These are just a few of the items for the agenda of the White House Conference, but clearly one of the most important issues for discussion should be the nature and amount of government support for all types of libraries.

A White House Conference must develop a broad public understanding of its recommendations for the progress of our libraries. That is why I have urged the President to call the White House Conference on Library and Information Services sometime in 1976.

"That the last two Presidents have demonstrated such marked hostility to support for libraries underscores the importance of the White House Conference on Libraries and Information Services... which so far President Ford has refused to call..."

Let me add that I believe that convening the Conference this year would be appropriate to the celebration of our nation's 200th anniversary. The Bicentennial year will be a time to review the accomplishments of our American experience. It will be a time to set new goals and resolve how best to reach them. We shall be asking ourselves what contributions Americans have made to better lives for our own people and others, and we shall be considering how we have succeeded in realizing the ambitions of our forefathers.

A White House Conference on Library and Information Services in 1976 would add to the serious appraisal of our past and future that should characterize our bicentennial activities.

Knowledge is the resource of which libraries are the custodians. The public library is a distinctively American contribution established on a scale as yet unmatched by any other large nation. Our libraries now must be vigorously supported if they are to continue to serve the people of the United States and meet the needs of a civilized society.

Keeping pace with the need to know...

Bell & Howell helps libraries think small.

Bell & Howell's Micro Photo Division anticipated the time when there would be more printed material than most libraries could efficiently handle. Today, we help libraries of all sizes meet their information requirements through the use of microforms.

TOTAL MICROFORM SERVICE

Regardless of your library's size, Bell & Howell's Micro Photo Division is prepared to assist with your microform needs. We offer periodicals on microfiche, newspapers on 35mm microfilm, and special scholarly collections in microform. We can also provide complete custom microform services to preserve your rare texts or publications, plus total Computer Output Microfilming (COM) capability.

Our Micro Photo representatives are always ready to help solve any microform problem you might have. They are expertly qualified to analyze your library's needs and recommend the most appropriate system of software and hardware components. We then follow through on a continuing basis to insure that your microform information remains current and up-to-date.

WE'LL BE READY FOR TOMORROW.

At Bell & Howell's Micro Photo Division we have made a commitment to library science through superior microform technology. The need for this technology will be even greater tomorrow, and we will respond—thinking smaller than ever.

A Symbol for the Future

What does the future hold? Change — of course. Challenge — almost certainly. Excitement — yes, if bookpeople have anything to say about it.

Brigham Young University Press is prepared to be part of that future. Although we're eight years young, we feel we're getting better and stronger every day. We feel we have a place in the world of books — in your world.

Spring 1976

Here is part of what we have in store for you and your patrons this Spring.

Custer in '76: Walter Camp's Notes on the Custer Fight edited by Kenneth Hammer, March, $10.95.

Christian Churches of America: Their Origins and Beliefs by Milton B. Backman, Jr., January, $11.95, $7.95 paper.

Conflict and Power in Social Life by James T. Duke, January, $9.95, $6.95 paper.

Insight to Impact: Strategies for Interpersonal and Organizational Change by William G. Dyer, January, $9.95, $6.95 paper.

Children: Sketches, Stories, and Thoughts by Ernst von Dombrowski, translated from the German by Garold and Norma Davis, April, $14.95.

The Homemaker's Guide to Home Nursing by Alice M. Schmidt, R.N.,
March, $5.95 paper.

And beyond

We're dedicated to the idea of publishing books of excellence for years to come. Our goal is to make a positive and continuing contribution to the library community. We invite you to look to us for the future.

Interface with Tomorrow: library issues in 1976

by Karl Nyren

LIKE ALL PEOPLE dedicated to a basic social task, we who are involved in libraries—librarians, technicians, specialists, trustees, booksellers, producers of audiovisual hardware and software, makers of machines and furniture and equipment, architects and designers—we are driven by imperatives, harried by problems, and charged with deciding among many ways of allocating the slender economic energies at our disposal.

The imperatives are simple, and in their simplest form, at least, we can believe that we share them with both our ancestors and our descendants in this trade: to acquire, to hold, and to make available the multifariously packaged forms of language in which one finds knowledge, information, opinion, even nonsense and bad counsel.

The problems swarm: which of all possible packages to acquire? How many of each? To what extent should they reflect immediate needs and to what extent the needs of tomorrow or of the long tomorrow—years, centuries, millennia? Then: to hold: what to hold and protect? How to house it? How to protect it against age, weather, violence done by insect or man or fire?

And then to make available: To whom? To what extent? By means of what activities and devices?

In order to cope with these problems and respond to the imperatives bridging our today and our tomorrow, we have a slim cambium of options: our human abilities, our organizations, and our technical resources. These—plus a certain amount of good luck—are the terms in which we will participate in a custodianship, and transmit to men, women, and children of future years gifts comparable to those we have received: the manuscript treasures of East and West; the laundry lists of centuries which now—or someday—will be mined by the archaeologists of culture for coprolites and gemstones, for the stories, the maps, the documents we treasure.

The specifics of our tasks are workaday in the libraries of the world, but unless they all add up to a reasonable balance of the three library imperatives—to get, to hold, and to dispense—the enterprise is failing in health and some one, possibly a very long time from now—will have to pay for our errors.

There is another level, the one at which we find the leaps of the mind and the victories of munificently-funded logistics. This is a heady level, but a disturbing one too. The fear persists that any great "advance" may turn out to have been a leap into the morass—a sad lesson we have learned from the "advances" of civilization that have given us the internal combustion engine, supergerms bred by antibiotics, the destruction of libraries entrusted to paper made by the sulfite process. Recent developments raise questions about the long term value of contributions made by established saints such as Dewey and Panizzi, and acolytes such as Fred Kilgour and Henriette Avram and Lawrence Livingston, to name only a few of the people busy creating the library future. On this level rest our fondest hopes for coping with the ancient problems—and our darkest fears that we will, after all, blow everything.

Acquiring

On the workaday level again: the librarian of 1976 faces specific problems: choosing among packages as varied as monographs, periodicals, audiovisual materials, and electronic data. None replaces another; the problem is to allocate, in a given library, the right amount of our slender energies toward possession of the most valuable packages. In the absence of anything like a formula, the librarian still makes the decision, in the late 20th Century, by a seat-of-the-pants computation of the claims of advertisers, the edicts of reviewers, the dicta of professors and colleagues, and the perceptions, preconceptions, and illusions of all involved, especially his own perceptions of his collection and his community.

Acquisition today involves another level of selection decisions; between excellence and transient appeal; between the publications of other nations and cultures and those of our own nation, region, even neighborhood.

And the recent emergence of workable cooperative organizations presents still another set of problems: if we are involved in cooperative acquisitions (and everyone should be to some extent) how do we allocate between "local" purchases and "cooperative" purchases, which will be less available to us even as they provide us greater assurance of some form of availability? We fly here by the seat of the pants still, although beginnings have been made on studies of actual collection usage, and the computer promises to make this sort of study easy, even routine. In the meantime, at every level of systematized acquisitions by a group of institutions, these decisions are being made by the seat of the pants, or ars, which the genius of Latin gives us as art.

Complications are raised by the interference of governments, pressure groups, or even individuals in the acquisition or dissemination of packages of communication which they find threatening to their authority, security, vanity, or even their daily income. Librarians are generally on firmer ground here in 1976: most of them agree that they ought not to be interfered with in the acquisition of any communication which they judge to be significant to their community of users (which can include the unborn and those at great distances, of course). Today in the United States many librarians feel free—even obligated—to acquire expressions of social and personal rebellion against governments and mores, as well as records of the seamy doings of the leaders of society. Though still clinging to the ideal of the socialization of the individual for the benefit of his fellows, librarians recognize today the responsibility to provide communicative packages which are savored as delights by some but condemned as evil by others—possibly including the librarians involved.

This greater liberality of the working librarian may, however, be more than offset by new threats: capture and exploitation by the private sector of information formerly distributed free or inexpensively by government agencies as public property—and new restrictions on information about government and corporations in the name of "privacy."

In recent years, the propriety of the ordinary citizens's access, not only to expressions of sexual, moral, or political zeal, but to information about the law and about medicine, about the economic values of consumer items, about the tactics of survival in the jungle of the present social order, has been accepted rather broadly, and public libraries especially have directed some energies toward these ends. The choice made, money is flowing today with some vigor through the library-publishing world to nourish the production and sale of books and other materials which serve these newly recognized ends. One result, of course, is that money is diverted from other ends and from the service of other social goals.

In the research library—academic or industrial—the problem of freedom to acquire needed materials exists today primarily in relation to the "proprietary" information upon which a firm depends for its livelihood, and in relation to constraints against unauthorized reproduction. In the first case, pressures are building today against corporate barriers as the benefits of sharing the special resources of others are gradually seen to outweigh the dollar value put upon exclusive access to information. In another case, it is generally agreed that the late 1970s will see the forging of a new economic relationship between the user and the producer—as mediated by the library. Little doubt is felt that the businessmen in publishing and production of other media have made their point to the government: that the profits to be realized from photocopying and otherwise reproducing publications by new technological processes rightfully belong—in part, at least, to the original copyright owner. This is expected to be enforced soon by means of some form of compulsory licensing.

A whole new area of responsibility has been opened up by the recent interest in government documents, an interest surely reflecting the renewed concern of librarians for unprocessed, raw information, for informational content regardless of—and in some ways preferred to—the traditional sophisticated packaging of the publishing industry. It is notable that this interest has blossomed without the aid of the computer—although the future of document acquisitions and management will necessarily be closely allied with the use of computers in libraries.

To hold

In many ways the interest of librarians in the preservation of their collections has been brought sharply into a new and urgent focus in this decade. Some of the factors are the acute shortage of space for storage of books; the rapidly disintegrating state of many print collections; the unanswered questions about the durability of much audiovisual software; a new awareness of the power of natural forces to wreak great damage—even in countries enjoying peace; the increasing threats posed by thieves and vandals.

This sudden and properly fearful concern has caused libraries to support further study into the means of arresting and preventing the processes of decay (the work of the Barrows Laboratory, for example and the New England Document Preservation Center). Conservation specialists are appearing as full-time members of the staffs of large libraries like Harvard; the merits and dangers of various forms of fire protection (to sprinkle or not to sprinkle) are debated, as are emergency measures for coping with water damage, which hardly seemed to exist as a problem until the disaster in Florence made it visible.

New security devices as well as the allocation of more manpower to guard duty have created new drains on finances as increasingly sophisticated thieves have moved from the sitting ducks, where first editions sit openly on public shelves, to the well-guarded rare book rooms—and most recently, to the archival collections.

As for the problem of space itself, a decade of furious building of libraries has only demonstrated the fact that librarians can fill buildings faster than they can be built—and now, a great deal faster than financing can be found for more new buildings. Despite some fear that reduced purchasing power will shrink library collections and leave large, empty libraries littering the landscape, the current space shortage has sparked new interest in space saving shelving, in cooperative depository arrangements, in microforms, and in harsher criteria for the acquisition and discard of materials.

The problems resolve themselves, at the highest policy level, into the question of the library's responsibility to contemporaries versus its concern for posterity. At the levels of more active involvement with materials, the librarian is involved today in providing space, arranging protection, providing succour in disaster, and deciding about alternative forms of preserving print, such as microforms.

Dissemination

Once it involved little more than deciding how long to make the chain which anchored the book to a lectern—and possibly mentioning the contents of one's collection in a letter to a fellow clerk somewhere far across feudal Europe or China. Today, the amount of energy expended in getting potential users of materials to become actual users is a large investment and an indication of a very basic assumption, possibly wrong-headed, but shared by a majority of librarians at this end of the century.

Its manifestations range from the growing numbers of librarian-taught courses in bibliography and other forms of library orientation in academic libraries, to bookmobiles ranging the ghettos, deserts, and mountains; to the interlibrary loan networks that crisscross the land. Also the selective dissemination of information (SDI) schemes in operation; the books travelling by mail to people unable to reach libraries; the expenditure of talent and funds on public relations efforts; the hunting out of nonusers of all kinds and the development of techniques to interest them in library services. The somewhat awkward term "outreach," applied usually to transactions with the economically and physically disadvantaged, actually characterizes well the feeling that the librarian of today has for everyone whom he might potentially serve. A question which has yet to be faced is how much we can invest in this one of many worthwhile activities.

Personnel

The trends observable in the three areas of acquisitions, preservation, and dissemination have direct implications for the human resources which libraries will need—if, indeed these trends, as seen at this point in time, do persist. There is probably no sure way to know whether the circumstances prevailing between now and the year 2000 will determine whether a trend has a long way to go or whether we are at this moment seeing it at the apogee.

But supposing that they are to persist, it seems clear that libraries will need increasingly higher levels of subject sophistication for their acquisitions operations; a cadre of skilled administrators of the housing of materials as well as a good number of people qualified to deal with damaged or otherwise threatened materials; and a "sales and service" force that ranges from clever public relations specialists to specialists in the location of information by means of network technologies, to people able to communicate with undergraduates, and children, and scientists, and statesmen—few of whom can be counted upon to find their way to needed information without specialized professional guidance. These very needs are being singled out for fulfillment by the multitude of "continuing education" opportunities being offered by library schools, associations, and institutions, and the emergent CLENE project can be expected to target them with even greater accuracy and effect.

Organizations

We are at this time beginning to experience considerable unease about the workability of our present arrangements of people in organizations. The simple hierarchical model started to break down in the fifties in many large libraries, just as they had achieved a maximum centralization of authority, and many borrowed a solution from industry: beef up the decision-making layers of the hierarchy with more people and let them participate with the top administrator in running the growing organization. This produced a great many more "deputies" and other colonels, although many of them turned out to be the same old middle management people with more money, bigger titles and offices, but not very much impact on the organization.

At the same time, pressures by top management itself began to increase the numbers of qualified and certified professionals (in large libraries especially) and demanded impressive additional qualifications in subject expertise as well. When these more highly qualified people replaced the older, often quite humble functionaries in the major departments of large libraries, dissatisfaction with the quality of administration above them was bound to show. And now, libraries everywhere are attempting to adapt to the new conditions by encouraging "participatory management" in a variety of forms—with varying results, and in 1976, little real success reported.

Meanwhile, participation in the making of decisions was being achieved by nonsupervisory staff by means of unions, which have proliferated, particularly on academic campuses, but also in many large city public libraries. At this time, librarians are still, on the whole, undecided about which route to take; fear of unions is sure to make administrators encourage participatory arrangements, while the still increasing demand for ever higher staff qualifications is bound to develop library staffs with the competence and the assurance of academic faculties—thus possibly setting up still a third alternative modeled after the classic opposition between professor and administrator.

Another organizational question concerns the new relations between people which will evolve from the many connective organizations and agencies developing to serve the functions of networks. There is considerable range now in these, from the rather subservient (in relation to the administrators of client organizations) to the potentially dominant. A study a few years ago found the former pattern quite widespread, but a close look today would probably show considerable movement toward the latter, and with the likelihood of network organizations of a regional or national scale attracting substantial funding, these agencies may exercise a growing domination over many aspects of library service.

If this be thought of as tending toward "consolidation," there is another kind of consolidation which may be expected to spread: the consolidation of local agencies under the line administration of larger units of government—along the lines of the present consolidation of municipal agencies in England, where such a change has, for one thing, drastically reduced the numbers of chief administrators in libraries.

The whole trend of staff development in libraries, may, however, be immediately and harshly re-routed by the library poverty which many are now seeing as the natural state to which we are being returned after a heady and unreal roller coaster ride on affluence. Academic librarians particularly have been weighing the sacrifices to make to keep afloat. There is strong likelihood that professional staffs will be cut back heavily, in the name of proper utilization of staff, and that middle management, which has been likened to the camel's hump that organizations build up in times of ease, will be sacrificed to the organization's more pressing survival needs. This could result in sharper polarization of staffs into "management" and "labor" factions.

But another interesting course has been suggested: the withering away of the top library management itself, and the return of the professional to a close working relationship with his academic department or whatever community he serves as a primary responsibility. It has been suggested that economic necessities may well recreate libraries in the model of the many departmental libraries of yesterday's campuses—but with the difference that the librarians in residence would, by means of the communications possible through networks and by a necessary adherence to the "electronic protocols," maintain the sophistication that the large library environment has made possible—without the cost of maintaining our present elephantine bureaucratic and architectural structures. Such development has been suggested, in somewhat different terms, by Hugh Atkinson (Ohio State University), who sees something like a Valhalla for the professional in fleeing the library for the academic department—and by Milt Byam (Queens Borough, N.Y., Public Library) who has recently suggested a library consisting of a storehouse connected to patrons by means of an efficient delivery service—such as a fleet of motorcycles.

Still another result of the continuing elevation of professional librarians to higher status could be felt in growth of supporting staffs, which as a matter of financial necessity would be lower paid, augmented by electronic technology and volunteers, and more numerous than professionals. Since on this level of paraprofessional staff would devolve most of the responsibility for primary and low level contact with clients, and for performing some of those tasks once considered professional, such as filing and copy cataloging, the library staff of tomorrow could develop in one of two distinct ways: toward the model of the postal service worker of today—low paid, heavily supervised and rule-ridden, and inefficient. Or towards the model already set by the librarians, who started where the parapros are now and have progressed toward permanent residence in the corridors of power.

Conclusion

The directions taken by libraries and librarians, and the other human enterprises with which they are most closely involved, will in any case develop through the latter half of the century as a microcosmic reflection of the overall pattern set by society itself.

It could be argued that American libraries have gone about as far as they can or will go in patterning themselves after large business firms, complete with 20th Century authority apparatus and lavish director's office (even in many quite small libraries)—and that librarians have gone as far as they can or will go in modelling themselves after medical professionals, always the height of professional attainment held out to librarians. It may be that the many salutary effects on the enterprise of librarianship which these two ideals have yielded have started to dwindle, and that society will once again grow bored and even intolerant toward its libraries unless they stay in tune with its temper.

And western democratic society today, it may be observed, is increasingly out of sympathy with the models of The Firm and The Professional, especially in their unholy alliance in the much noted "managerial revolution," and views them as exploitative rather than supportive of human concerns.

It may be that we see the model of the public library of the future in an unusual place: the school library, where with often surprisingly little administrative apparatus or trappings a setting is provided where teachers and students can interact in their mutual endeavor. School libraries have achieved this relatively economical way of life despite—and possibly also because of—apathy on the part of their parent institutions, and to approximate their state in this respect the public library would have to locate itself in a larger institutional complex. And as a matter of fact, there are straws in the wind: libraries being housed in multipurpose buildings with other recreational and service agencies, for example. Libraries once restricted to one geographically or otherwise bounded clientele are freely serving others and thus encouraging the development of a more viable, user-oriented facility.

Public libraries can look also to their academic counterparts for new directions. Academic libraries manage to spend a far greater amount of their financial energies on books and other informational materials than do public libraries. Large public libraries, in particular, spend practically all their funds on personnel and upkeep of buildings and collections, and sometimes as little as eight percent of each million dollars they receive is spent on books. But academic libraries, even quite large ones, can spend as much or more for books as they do for salaries, as a result of their location within an academic institution with its plentiful student help and possibly other, less obvious advantages.

One model suggests itself to the academic and public library alike: the special library, where the tribal state that Atkinson foresees for college libraries is already achieved in some ways. Special librarians are fully creatures of specific clienteles, highly developed in their specialized abilities and dedicated on a narrow enough range so that they can focus professional accomplishment to the immediate benefit of an employer. This is the ideal state, of course, with special libraries, one not always even close to realization. Still it provides a model that has much kinship with public library "outreach" efforts tailored to special groups and to the vision of small, highly competent departmental academic libraries.

If this is indeed to be the direction of change—and this writer clearly thinks so—responsibility for its shepherding into reality will lie with nonlibrary academic and civic administrators: chancellors, mayors, library trustees. It will also lie heavily on the shoulders of the professional librarian, the practitioner as distinguished from the administrator. And for the development of the kind of library thinking and training supportive of such a change, responsibility will also rest on the library schools.

Libraries are by nature what we are today calling "low energy" processes, in the sense that all indications are that society will never devote more than a minor fraction of its resources to them. In attempting to identify with and model themselves on the "high energy" institutions like manufacturing and entertainment, libraries have been misled, but not seriously damaged. It was a period of development that may well be found to have been necessary. But that time and that need have passed; we need to start building the libraries and training the librarians of the future today.

redefining the academic library

by Hendrik Edelman

THERE is a great temptation to view the future of academic and research libraries through a pair of dark glasses. After all, financial ceilings appear to have been reached, inflation continues and the growth rate of collections is declining. Reductions in staff are taking place everywhere, money for physical expansion is not in sight, and the costs of long awaited technological solutions are soaring. On a larger scale, colleges and universities are facing enrollment reductions, public finance is in disarray, Ph.D.'s are unemployed and the economic value of undergraduate education is being questioned.

If we use projections based on experiences between 1955 and 1970, most libraries are now falling substantially short of expectation levels. Adding insult to injury are the lofty hopes of NCLIS and a continuing flow of literature suggesting solutions for largely undefined problems through electronic networks, management techniques, use of audiovisual materials, microfilms, and especially resource sharing. Any serious conflict between expectations and realities creates frustration and it appears that it is frustration indeed—with all its side-effects—that characterizes the current professional debate on the academic library future.

There is no doubt in my mind that the immediate future should bring a number of changes and adjustments in various library programs. Recognizing the difficulties in redirecting the course of the critical mass of collections, catalogs, and traditions, some of these changes will undoubtedly be painful. If we look further ahead however, there are good reasons to believe that these changes and different concepts may be very beneficial and indeed may open a new future of continued successful development.

The academic environment

The emphasis in the following analysis of a number of the major factors which influence higher education, and my description of their expected effects within academe is on the positive aspects of these developments and library reactions to them.

The present and future state of higher education has not suffered from any lack of attention. The Carnegie Commission on Higher Education, established in 1967 to survey colleges and universities and to develop guidelines for short- and long-range planning, has generated an impressive series of reports. A considerable number of other studies have been sponsored by the federal and state governments as well as by scholarly and professional societies.

There is a consensus on the tremendously successful efforts to educate an increasingly large part of the American population as well as on the quality of instruction and research programs. There is also agreement on the fact that the price of all this has been phenomenal. According to these studies, higher education used about one percent of the gross national product in 1960, and in the early 1970's that figure had risen to two-and-a-half percent. No other segment of society more than doubled its take during that period of time. Major contributors to this cost increase are the doubling of the student body, the tripling of Ph.D.'s awarded, and the sharp rise in advanced degree programs. There have been extraordinarily heavy capital investments in buildings, computer facilities, and libraries. Faculty salaries have risen more rapidly than others and it is generally recognized that inflation in academic institutions is always somewhat higher than the national average.

Management inefficiencies and government regulations have increased administrative overhead. During the last two years energy costs have hit especially hard.

Tuition and administrative fees went up, but other income such as state aid, endowment income and gifts, grants from foundations and research support from the federal government have not kept pace. At present, virtually all institutions of higher education throughout the country are making necessary budget and program adjustments. The larger private universities use the power of their endowments to try to stretch cutbacks over a longer period, thus lessening the immediate impact. Depending on the relative welfare of individual states and the competition for available funds between institutions, state universities usually have to act more abruptly and we see several dramatic reversals of previous affluence. The lack of national planning for higher education makes institutions vulnerable to immediate fluctuations of the political and economic marketplace; the effects on the educational programs can be drastic. Some weaker colleges are closing, mergers are taking place, and most of the larger institutions report a sharp increase in the elimination and consolidation of academic programs and courses. There is a renewed emphasis on teaching and the current flight of a large part of the student population into professional training programs contributes to that trend.

Historically, major changes in higher education have been forced from the outside and there is no reason to believe that this will be different in the future. Academic governance does not lend itself to hard decision making and only reacts to pressures from society and, notably, government agencies.

Enrollment

One of the major influential factors is enrollment. Much has been written about the effect of demographic changes on higher education. There is obviously no doubt about the declining birthrate and the smaller number of 20-year-olds 19 years from now. However, the percentage of the pool of potential students that will actually try to enter college is not at all certain. There are conflicting trends especially with regard to potential minority and adult enrollment and the perceived declining value of the college degree. With a number of students decreasing, a proportionally greater decrease will take place in the ranks of the social classes—minorities, the poor, etc.—that have formed the bulk of the enrollment increases in the past two decades. Traditional career goals and financial means will be the major factors in continuing the "elitist" character of the student body of the major colleges and universities. The result of this will be a steady enrollment level in the "quality" institutions and a sharp decline elsewhere. The youngest institutions are likely to suffer the most.

The academic interests of this future student population are even more difficult to predict. Barring dramatic events such as real threats to the national security, no major changes need be expected. Graduate enrollment will decline but there will be a concentration of continued activity in the well established graduate schools. Shortcut degrees such as the Doctor of Arts level have been tried before without much impact. The emphasis on professional degrees is likely to continue for a considerable period.

Although it now appears that in the face of the limited available funds for higher education "the detente between public and independent sectors is almost surely going to dissolve" (Chronicle of Higher Education, October 20, 1975), it seems likely that after the storm the traditional mutual dependence will remain. This, of course, may differ from state to state. The more equal distribution of funds by state legislatures among different institutions will have the real effect of serious erosion of the quality of graduate programs. Formula budgeting, which will undoubtedly increase, will even reinforce this trend. Traditionally, the individual states have carried the burden of undergraduate education and we may expect that to continue. Sustained graduate programs and research will increasingly rely on federal funds with quality and productivity as the main selection criteria.

The federal government has been remarkably consistent in its efforts not to support regular ongoing higher education activities. Injections of federal aid have always been "cause-oriented," be it in deployment of World War II veterans, Sputnik, or energy research. It seems realistic, however, to assume that enough "causes" will occur during the next two decades to insure substantial federal investment in the research capability of American universities. If historical developments are any indication, we must assume that the bulk of that federal funding will go to some 60 to 70 institutions strongly committed to research. The "haves" will once again be separated from the "have-nots." This trend to concentrate aid has been visible in the recent execution of the NDEA programs, and has been practiced by the major foundations as well.

Distasteful as this view may be philosophically, most practical indicators do point that way. It may be of interest to quote here from the 1975 Ladd-Lipset survey of American faculty members as reported in the Chronicle of Higher Education, October 13, 1975: "American academics constitute a teaching profession, not a scholarly one. There is a small scholarly subgroup located disproportionally at a small number of research oriented universities." This statement is based on the remarkably low overall publication rate of professors, clearly contradicting the pervasive notion that research output is the most important criterion for professors.

It probably would be wishful thinking to assume that colleges and universities will emerge with clear mission statements, but undoubtedly there will be efforts in that direction. A number of states have intensive review programs underway that will lead to a much sharper definition of the graduate programs. A case in point is the current effort in New York State where the quality and viability of all graduate programs, in state institutions as well as in private schools, is being evaluated. The decisions, controversial as they may be from a local standpoint, will lead to reduction in volume and, hopefully, an upgrading of the quality.

The library consequences

The consequences of this academic realignment for college and university libraries should be considerable. It will allow, if not force, librarians to define the shape, size, and form of their collections and services.

The challenge for librarians, of course, is to take the initiative and direct the adjustments. Failure to do so will allow the earlier mentioned movement of critical mass to clash with outside restraints and pressures. Under such circumstances, decisions will be made under duress and many times by default.

Collection development

If a much clearer separation between teaching and research does take place, probably only 100 of the 2800 academic libraries in the U.S. will need to develop research collections. Through close realignment with the teaching programs, librarians in most other institutions will be able to make a separation between materials purchased and processed for functional and predictable use, and those added for permanent retention.

Librarians will have to view the teaching collections as live organisms, in which all parts have to play continuously active roles. Tenure for books should be given reluctantly and for very good reasons only.

A collection that is maintained properly will not have to grow by a factor correlated to the growth of knowledge; it may very well be stable in size for a long period of time. Collections will vary from campus to campus as each teaching program will continue to have its unique aspects. The mix between books, periodicals, audiovisual materials, and microforms will undoubtedly be maintained and there are no indications that a real revolution will take place in either of the latter two areas.

There is no new technology in sight that would reduce the cost of books and journals. Recognizing the continued fiscal restraint in the years ahead, judicious selection decisions will have to be made. Unfortunately, very little serious study has been done on the decision making process in book selection. A substantial part of the profession is unprepared to mold collection goals, available materials, and available funds into a workable selection model. This process of continuously shaping the collections has been performed successfully only by a number of exclusively undergraduate colleges and undergraduate libraries in larger universities. In practice, it becomes a difficult process in libraries serving a mixed audience. The process of identifying short- and long-term investments in books will become crucial in those institutions where graduate education will be de-emphasized. Close collaboration with faculty, description of objectives, and a healthy dose of self-restraint can make for successful selecting and reviewing of materials however.

Unfamiliar as librarians in general research libraries may be with the concept, the same division should be applied. Because of the depth of the curriculum in research universities, there is of course much less direct influence of the academic program on the selection process. There are, unfortunately, no descriptive standards for research collections and the determination of what constitutes quality remains difficult. However, the recognition that not all books, once acquired, should be retained forever is an important one. Librarians have learned the hard way that massive infusion of newly published secondary materials only improves the holdings statistics. The professional challenge will be to actively take charge and redirect the dictation of selection policies by format of publication (books versus periodicals) as well as to correct the tendency to let the English language dominate. The effective research collection in the 1980's will be weeded down to realistic size, will acquire fewer but more carefully selected books than at present, and will continue to grow.

Impact on publishing

Scholarly book and journal publishing will feel the impact of these reductions. The market has been traditionally serviced by not-for-profit publishers. During the past 20 years a relatively small group of commercial agencies have absorbed the growth of the market. The number of books, journals, microform projects, and the like, published solely for the research library market will decrease. In contrast to this, there will be a growing output of primary source material from official and semi-official agencies throughout the world. Microforms will play an important role in the dissemination of these materials to libraries.

It will be quite possible to maintain good and functional research collections in the sciences and the social sciences without disproportionate amounts of money and effort. However, it will be more difficult to do so for collections serving the humanities and historical disciplines. A new balance may be found between lower expectations and practical possibilities, but it is likely that the comprehensive resources in languages other than English and especially Third World collections will deteriorate unless federal or foundation support is secured.

National collections

No university library can or will afford to maintain and build collections requiring substantial investment for the sake of the "scholarly world," unless there is strong pressure from within the institution. Plans for coordinated collection development, based on voluntary participation have never worked and will not work in the future. Unfortunately, the NCLIS proposal for government support for unique national resources is much too vague to be acceptable. If solutions are forthcoming, it will be in the form of a few centralized national collections, rather than an elaborate decentralized system. The experience with the comprehensive collections requiring no bibliographical control such as dissertations, if the Center for Research Libraries points that way, and certainly the British experience is invaluable in this respect.

The sharing of collections through interlibrary loan methods does not face an easy future. The cost of transactions in that traffic has become prohibitive for the lending institution and as soon as the current tendency to charge the borrowing library is fully implemented, the actual flow will become a trickle. Paradoxically, as the apparent need for resource sharing rises, the possibilities for doing so will decline. State funded networks rather than national funding will be the likely direction. More than ever before will academic libraries be forced to be supportive of local academic programs.

Technical services

Most of the work in technical services during the past ten years has been directed toward automation and standardization. Many of the major projects, such as MARC, OCLC, and now CONSER have needed years of preparation. Ironically, the growth projections in academic libraries were an important factor in the development of these systems. Under reduced acquisitions and cataloging rates, the overhead cost per transaction is increasing. This applies to local systems as well as national ones. Moreover, most of the systems have been developed with "soft" funds and it is only recently that real calculations are taking place. It has now been adequately proved that computer applications can be of help in the processing of library materials, but the cost of doing so turns out to be very high.

It is almost heresy to discuss alternative processing methods. But funds in many libraries will not be readily available for continued participation in cooperative automated processing programs. Unless there is a federal rescue, a good number of them may be on their own again.

Bibliographic pollution

The real problems are in cataloging. The descriptive and subject cataloging standards as promulgated by the Library of Congress were, as far as I know, never seriously questioned before their mass acceptance in academic libraries. In that acceptance, libraries have seriously polluted their card catalogs with an incomprehensible system of corporate entries and meaningless subject headings. Card catalogs in the large libraries have now been declared unmanageable, but the same bibliographic pollution has taken place in machine readable files. The cumulative effects of indiscriminate file building over the next 10 or 15 years will require even more sophisticated access tools to use. Academic library users do not need to know everything about every book in the country. There always has been a discrepancy between the librarian's urge for complete bibliographic control and the actual use of the collections. The large systems are most likely to break down and those libraries that have developed independent and simplified access tools will be the most successful.

Services

The difference between good and bad libraries lies in the quality of the staff. Human resources are the largest segment of the budget of academic libraries and that will continue in the future.

Innovative approaches to reach out to students, especially undergraduates, are showing great promise in actually improving academic performance. With a smaller percentage of materials available locally and less emphasis on creating bibliographical records, the burden of interpreting published knowledge is on the librarian. In the typical teaching environment, the changes will not be very big. Administrative choices will have to be made, one of which should be a more pronounced shift away from collection building in favor of sustained or improved direct user services. As more sophisticated bibliographical tools become available, whether in print or in machine readable form, there will be a greater need to "translate" the information for the user. This will be especially true in libraries supporting research efforts in the science and social sciences. The performance model in those libraries will be based on successful practices in special libraries. There will be an increased emphasis on the librarian as a deliverer of information, rather than as the custodian of the knowledge storehouse. More subject specialists will be called for and the library will be judged on its ability to perform, rather than on the size or the depth of the collections. This is not necessarily true for humanities and history collections, where there is less pressure for immediacy of information, and where staff cannot be a real substitute for the availability of source materials.

Administration

None of the changes described above can be made without a convinced and committed library administration. Political sensitivity will be needed more than ever before, especially in the competition for funds within the college or university community. Accountability to the academic as well as to the library staff will increasingly be required. This accountability will require more administration rather than less and there will be no easy formula for maintaining a balance between day-to-day operating pressures and enlightened long-term planning. The past few years have already shown the emergence of a new type of library administrator. A low key manner, emphasis on local problems, and dedication to group problem solving seem to be the most wanted ingredients. Following developing patterns in society, there will be no room for the highly personalized approach that has characterized library development in the past. The effective ability of difficult decision making under such communal leadership can be questioned, but there is no choice, fortunately.

A redefinition of quality library service in academic institutions is in order and I am confident that libraries will continue to succeed.

Some thoughts on ELECTRONIC LIBRARY SECURITY and the CHECKPOINT MK II FULL CIRCULATION System

1. In the past it has been shown that BY PASS Systems
- are least expensive to buy
- require that all library materials, whether charged out or not, be handled every time they leave the library
- therefore, require manned inspection either at the circulation desk or at an inspection station
- are most effective at loss reduction.

2. While FULL CIRCULATION Systems
- are most expensive . . . require extra equipment
- cannot be used to protect magnetic tapes (cassettes, cartridges; lecture, video or computer tapes) because activation-deactivation is magnetic and will scramble or erase tapes
- do not require the handling of previously charged materials every time they leave the library
- can, therefore, be unmanned and operated remotely from the circulation desk
- are less effective at loss reduction . . . easier to tamper with.

3. However, the CHECKPOINT MK II Full Circulation System changes all that
- Cost–is much less than any other Full Circulation System. Basically the same as the CHECKPOINT By Pass System, it requires no extra equipment and no change in present circulation procedures.
- Magnetic tapes CAN be protected because activation-deactivation is not magnetic.
- The small 2-5/8" x 3-3/16" pressure sensitive CHECK-label can protect everything in the collection from tiny Shakespeare plays and foreign language dictionaries (so easy to slip into a pocket) to a variety of non-print items including phonodiscs . . . and with NO FALSE ALARMS
- Loss reduction results are astoundingly good, as this letter from a CHECKPOINT MK II Full Circulation user will attest:

Dear Mr. Rehborn:

We have just completed our annual book inventory; the first one that includes the operation of our Checkpoint Mark II system for a full year. I think you will be interested in the results.

Our book losses have been reduced by 97 per cent.

We knew, of course, from our daily activities that the situation had improved substantially, but were very pleased by the statistical confirmation.

It contains the bar encoded label used in our LIBS 100 circulation control system. A totally automated system that puts book and patron information instantly at your fingertips. With accuracy and efficiency that only data processing can provide.

At CLSI we make a growing group of systems that help libraries manage their resources and costs more effectively. In addition to our circulation control module, there's a CLSI book acquisition system that keeps impeccable account of your orders and their related costs. A materials booking system for the non-book items in your library. And a payroll system for your personnel. Our LIBS 100 system is already installed in scores of libraries across the country.

Most important, with CLSI you get a complete system. Programmed equipment that is installed and ready to go. Support from skilled technical experts and service personnel. And involvement that goes beyond business. CLSI professional staff librarians join you before installation to smooth the transition from your old system. And remain ready to help you even when your new system has become familiar.

Call CLSI for more information about a system that's right for your library. We'd like to give you our card.

1876. Library Journal is born. And Mr. Thomas Y. Crowell publishes his first list of books.

New York's Central Park, today

1876. New Yorkers are ecstatic over the completion of their city's Central Park. Ulysses S. Grant is our eighteenth and not too popular President. A book called TOM SAWYER is published and banned in Denver. Alexander Graham Bell gets a patent for an instrument called a telephone. And Melvil Dewey introduces his decimal system for classifying books to a newly formed group called the American Library Association.*

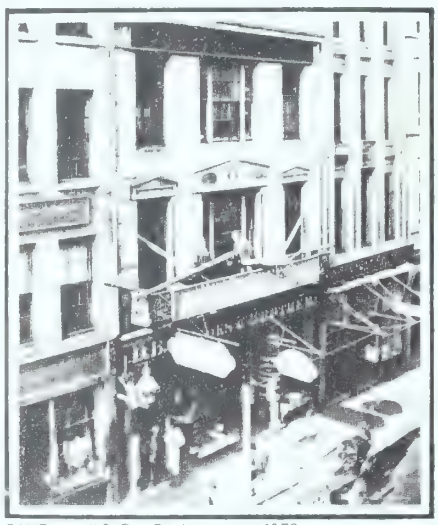
In that same year, at 744 Broadway in New York City, Thomas Crowell, a Boston bookbinder, was busy at work finalizing plans to open the doors to Thomas Y. Crowell, Book Publisher.

Along with two other men, he worked furiously to get his books, plates, paper and inks in order. And, in July of 1876—the month and year of America's Centennial summer—Thomas Y. Crowell issued his first catalog. It contained eight pages and described sixty-one books.

Mr. Crowell was proud. More importantly, he was a success: his books sold.

But to Thomas Y. Crowell that never seemed the primary reason for being in publishing. He hoped he had founded an institution that would contribute to the world's store of knowledge, provide entertainment, have a share in the molding of public opinion, and prove worthy of a long life.

A brief glance at a current Crowell catalog (now averaging sixty pages every six months) plus a look at some of the company's "firsts" would show that Thomas Crowell's reputation for editorial excellence and fine craftsmanship continue to be upheld.



T Y Crowell & Co., Boston, circa 1870

T. Y. Crowell was the first publisher to present a work by Tolstoy in America. And the first publisher in any country to present a uniform edition of Tolstoy's works. (This year, as a matter of fact, sees the reissue by Crowell of WAR AND PEACE. The new edition was translated by the distinguished Constance Garnett.) Crowell was also first to bring the American public that treasury of words and phrases, ROGET'S THESAURUS. The book, practically a staple in American homes and offices, will appear in a new fourth edition in 1977.

Today, Crowell histories and biographies fill library shelves across America. Our many reference books, such as THE READER'S ENCYCLOPEDIAS and the FUNK & WAGNALLS DICTIONARY, are library institutions. As much an institution is Funk & Wagnalls' THE NEW EMILY POST'S ETIQUETTE, one of the biggest best-sellers of all times. (Indeed, it was in 1876, in New York City, that Funk & Wagnalls, now a division of Crowell, was also founded.)

Our fiction and general nonfiction are considered among the best published in this country. And the prestigious Crowell Children's Books win award upon award, year in and year out, and are valued by librarians everywhere.

A lot has happened in the world of books since the days when Thomas Y. Crowell published his first catalog. This Centennial Issue of LIBRARY JOURNAL is proof of that. And everyone at T. Y. Crowell congratulates LIBRARY JOURNAL on its 100th Anniversary. If Mr. Crowell were around today, we know he'd be as excited about the event as you are.

THE URBAN PUBLIC LIBRARY:

proving utility

AMERICA was a very young nation, not yet a century old, when public libraries began to flourish. Their emergence was stimulated by an increasing "need to know" many things on many levels in a rapidly expanding society. The image of public libraries as the "people's university" was established early in their history and through the years the book collections have reflected the information needs of growing industrialization. Fledgling public library systems played a vital role in the Americanization of many of the immigrants arriving in waves of millions over several decades.

From the beginning, the public library evolved as a separate and distinct institution, not within a parent institution as in the case of school, academic, scientific, business or industrial libraries. Serving the public directly as part of local government, the public library has been inescapably affected by local political fortunes. Perhaps this sensitive, unsheltered position accounts for the fact that foremost among various kinds of libraries the public library has come to be the least sure of its role, of its obligations, and its potential. The acute financial problems of recent years and the trauma of continuing social revolution have been both a threat and a challenge to this institution that has long been an integral part of American civilization.

Reaction time

The expressions "social revolution and change," "response to change," "institutional change," etc., have been dulled into triteness by overuse. Nevertheless, change is the overriding characteristic of our crisis-crowded area. The most common charge against all traditional institutions (including the public library) is that they are no longer "relevant" to current needs and conditions. Relevance (that overworked word!) is the popular goal and measure of service, but all criteria, criticisms, and self-doubts must be carefully evaluated if appropriate response is to be made. Actually, only creative professional and folk arts have the flexibility to register immediate response to the human pulse beat; institutions would destroy themselves if they attempted immediate and continuous accommodation. The institutional obligation in this period of rapid change is extremely difficult to execute: to preserve and insure the flow of civilization, holding firm to proven values amidst turmoil, yet recognizing and utilizing substantive new ideas and trends. In former generations when change was more gradual than now, the reaction time of institutions was not under fire, but today there is an unceasing bombardment of challenges to all established ways.

Change since Berelson

A landmark study was published in 1949, The Library's Public by Bernard Berelson, assisted by Lester Asheim. Their description of library usage patterns holds true today, but there is a contrast in attitude toward library service. The unprecedented urban changes had not come about in 1949, and the social concerns that are everyday considerations in the present era had not yet emerged on the scene. Traditional library support had not been threatened by shrinking funds, inflation, and an increasing variety of demands made on city budgets. The following quotations from The Library's Public reflect a philosophy of service which changing attitudes and practices have challenged in the ensuing years:

> . . . The residents do not know a great deal about the library, and not many of them use it directly; but they do approve of it, and they support it without much grudging. . . . The library clientele . . . is not a representative cross-section of the town's population . . . The public library is as democratic an institution as is found in this country, in the sense that it is freely open to all comers; but its self-selected clientele is a more or less distinctive group within the community. The library is pretty much a "middle-class" institution. It is not used much by the rich, who tend to buy their books, or by the poor, who often find it difficult to read books. . . . It is chiefly composed of people . . . with enough formal education to make reading easy and useful, yet without enough money to buy all the books they want. . . . A plausible argument can be made that under present conditions the public library should be organized for those relatively few people in the community who can make "serious" use of library materials.
> No one institution or agency in the community today attracts the majority of the population, and certainly no cultural institution comes close to doing so. It may be well that the proper role of the public library is deliberately and consciously to serve the "serious" and "culturally alert" members of the community rather than attempt now to reach all the people. This approach to the problem of planning the course of the public library within the coming years is strengthened by this review of the research literature, which clearly demonstrates that universality of public library service is practically impossible for the public library at the present time, regardless of the aggressiveness of the library in promoting itself. It may be, therefore, that the librarian should explicitly redefine his goal from attempting to serve the total community to providing the minority of "serious" users of books and seekers for information with the tools which they need. Perhaps his selection of materials, his technical procedures, his promotional activities should be concentrated on this select group—and his gratifications too. This would call for a redefinition of the public library's raison d'être into one that could be supported by actual library practice. The library's attempt to serve the total community is bound to bring disappointment and perhaps deterioration in the quality of its service. The library serves a small clientele today; it would lose no prestige by serving an even smaller group with a higher quality of service. This might, in the long run, best promote interests of the community.

A new outlook

An entirely different social outlook prevails today and our drastically altered economy strongly affects the philosophy of service of all institutions. In retrospect, the resignation to elitist service is rather startling in a period not very remote. It is a reminder that the pace of change in recent history is very swift. The use of public libraries and other cultural institutions can never compete with the absolute coverage of compulsory public education. However, the prevailing assumption today is that our cultural institutions, certainly including libraries, have meaning and application in the lives of people across all lines of class and education. Three other factors loom very important. 1) Every dimension of public library service has not been explored. 2) Public libraries are in competition with all governmental services, and in apportioning funds, responsible officials are forced to employ very practical standards and make hard-nosed choices. 3) There is no necessary correlation between the development of services appropriate to the needs and interests of the masses and lowered quality.

For many years library literature has mirrored the profession's earnest effort to understand and define the changing role of the public library. For over two decades there has been broad participation in experimental "projects" which we hoped would restore the vitality of former times. We are assessing our strengths and our potential and we are increasingly determined to meet the needs of today. The outlines of a new relationship between public libraries and the tumultuous new order of society are still uncertain, but we are being moved forward by irresistible historic forces to understand our way into a new era of service.

Proof of utility

Who would ever have expected a few years back that such safely established institutions as public schools and public libraries would suffer the uprooting challenges that have come in recent years? We have grown accustomed to the intense criticism levelled from every quarter at public schools and we observe the changes taking place in their philosophy and organization. Although the public library still enjoys a kind of veneration and affection in the public regard, sentimentality and nostalgia carry little weight in hard decision making, especially in times of unusual economic stress. In a full-scale economic depression, everyone is in financial difficulty, but during the greater part of the past decade a tortuous uncertainty has been reserved for the public library, the large urban systems first, and gradually encompassing the smaller. We have been forced to come to grips with the reality that the traditional security of public libraries can no longer be taken for granted. Proof of utility is the hard test we must face. The depressed economy is the catalyst, but even the restoration of prosperity will probably not bring a relaxation of the new measures of essentiality: What services do you offer that are indispensable to the welfare of a substantial portion of the citizenry? Are your services unique or can they be combined with the functions of other departments or institutions? What does your service cost? What tangible contribution does it make? The continuing erosion of the urban tax base by the exodus of population and business has stimulated a desperate search for more abundant and more reliable support plans or resources. The perennial quest for increased state and federal aid to public libraries is intensified. The Nixon administration's negative attitude toward continued funding of the Library Services and Construction Act was a decided setback and "Revenue Sharing" has fallen far short of its promise. A great deal of added time and effort has necessarily been expended in trying to hold on to the hard-won federal aid of many years.

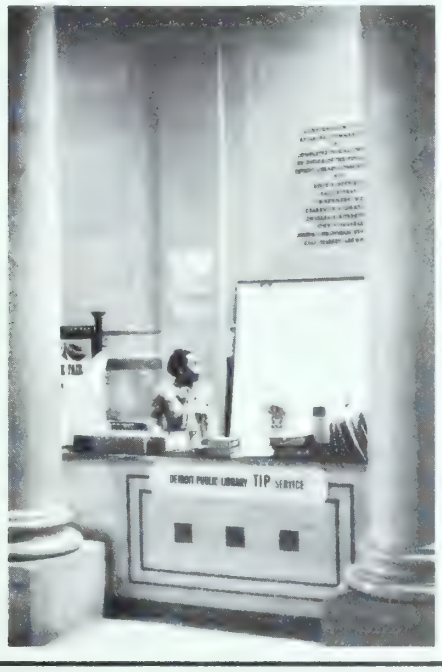
Crisis of the cities

The welfare of the public library is inextricably interwoven with the destiny of the city, the financial dilemma of libraries being one manifestation of characteristic urban ills. Although we are a predominantly urban nation, there is widespread indifference or resignation to the desperate plight of cities. There is an alarming feeling of detachment from the travail and an underlying resentment and fear of the troublesome burden. This must stem in part from preoccupation with the painful impingement on our daily lifes of snowballing social problems. This kind of climate encourages the indefinite postponement of confrontation with basic causes.



To the harsh charge, "Detroit is dying! let it die; we don't need it," a Detroit newspaperwoman, Helen Fogle, replied: "Detroit is not dying; it is changing!" A look at history confirms this declaration. The cities of the world have changed many times. They have been sacked, burned, flooded, occupied, devastated by bombing, the inhabitants killed by plague or famine, yet there are shining examples of revitalization. It is very sobering to realize that never before has the intrinsic value of cities been a matter of doubt or indifference. Until now the threat of destruction or extinction has not come from that quarter. We cannot foretell yet whether or not Americans are going to allow their parent-cities to die by default. The meaning of such an eventuality and its far-reaching effects has not been grasped yet—whether it be New York City, Detroit, or any of the other great or small cities. The realization has not dawned that the various aspects of our difficulties cannot be treated as separate and unrelated, but rather, each is a portion of the whole human entanglement. Our nation is reacting in a great variety of ways to the temper and circumstances of our age, with the most terrible shocks and tremors being registered in cities. An alternative interpretation of the present trauma is that instead of violent death, we are actually witnessing and participating in the agonizing pain of rebirth.

Urban libraries respond

These are the harsh realities public libraries must face—the low esteem in which cities are held, city-dwellers' doubt of themselves, shrinking financial resources, and decreased readership. Serious financial ills have surfaced only in recent years, but the many-faceted present crisis in public libraries has been a long time in the making.

When the profession became uneasy a number of years back, the earliest response was an attempt to make book selection and staffing reflect more sensitively the new public it served. Next came a vigorous effort to make programming more relevant. Under the banner of "outreach," librarians of the nation mounted a giant-size, intensely sincere effort to gather in the heretofore "unreached." The Library's Public can give us some clues about who the "unreached" are even today. This report revealed that public libraries were serving only about 15 to 25 percent of the total population. The library's limited penetration into the community was more or less accepted as a fact of life and a definition of the potential or obligation of public library service. The 15 to 25 percent figures must be turned around for the full impact to be appreciated. The astounding message they give is that 75 to 85 percent of the population was "unreached." In the ensuing quarter century, library service has been extended into cultural and geographic areas hitherto unserved; consequently, a study made today would show inroads into the 75 to 85 percent. Nevertheless, from those figures it can be reasonably deduced that the "unreached" continue to be the majority of the American people. The limited perimeters of 1950 (service to the "leaders") would be unacceptable today.

Outreach

In public library parlance of recent years "outreach" has been associated with the "disadvantaged" or with the "inner city." In the back of our minds there has been a simplistic belief that if only the burgeoning "minorities" could somehow be enticed to read, public library service would be restored to the "normalcy" of yesteryear. Following this line of thought, attractive programming seemed to be the appropriate device to lure new patrons. Librarians' skills and inventiveness know no bounds, and the entire public, "underprivileged" and "privileged" alike, has benefitted immeasurably from the campaign of enriched programming of the past two or more decades. However, we must realize that mastery of the techniques of "relevant" programming and improved staffing patterns, together with more flexible book selection, are only the obvious, beginning steps, albeit important ones. Experience and logic have demonstrated that we can no longer burden these initial moves with all our expectations of expanding library usage. Programming is not the only technique open to us. The shock of the "15 to 25 percent" (or 30 or 35 percent, or thereabout) should stimulate exploration of our entire fund of professional skills and library resources. Librarians give no evidence of self-doubt in the matter of the essential nature of public library service to the life of the community. Our sustained "outreach" effort proves that we have moved a long way from contentment with the 1949 assessment of public library potential. However, in view of social conditions and general educational development, the immediate prospect is not good for restoring a strong enough adult readership in fiction, biography, travel, and the like, to replace the substantial body of confirmed readers that kept libraries busy until the onset of the "changing city." One significant exception is work with children. Children from every level of society respond to library promotional efforts. Work with children in public libraries is an unsung success story. The hope of developing confirmed readers (always a legitimate and worthy aim for libraries) can be fulfilled principally from the ranks of children who learn to love books and use libraries early in life.

Librarians began filing out into the highways and byways of their communities as soon as "change" was in the air, a thrilling story of a profession rising to the occasion. They took the message of the library's services to labor unions, churches, lodges, block clubs, parent-teacher organizations, schools, wherever people gathered, and to the media as well. To their credit they have never wavered in their conviction that the library must go to the people, but the inspiration to continue has come from librarians' dedication rather than from the reward of success. It seems increasingly evident that we can no longer depend solely on the traditional cornerstone of public library service to adults—reference work, reading guidance, and programming—to stimulate sufficient interest and satisfy a broad enough range of needs. For a great variety of reasons the library's offerings have not been compelling or competitive enough to reach beyond the "leaders." There has been no irresistible product or service that touches a conscious need in people's lives.

Service at the "gut level"

Perhaps we have grown too cynical to speak of libraries in terms of "irresistible" or "compelling" except when referring to confirmed readers (certainly mystery fans qualify). On the other hand, it is not ludicrous to speak of offering something at the "gut level," help that reaches people where they are. Information and referral service in public libraries merits serious consideration as a major additional tool to help people in their everyday lives. In the evolution of library practice it has emerged as a logical response to a demonstrated need. Where tried seriously in public libraries, the introduction of a central community information center has been welcomed by the public as a relief from wandering through the bureaucratic maze.

Libraries have always supplied practical, life-needs type information in an informal, more or less unstructured way in both central and branch libraries. Through the years no category was designated for this type of service, nor were formal procedures established and developed into a system. The appropriateness of the service as a major activity for libraries was not recognized; consequently, it remained on the fringes, taken for granted but never standardized as regular "library work." Certainly everyday information needs have not diminished in today's world; life has grown more complex and impersonal than ever. There is increasing need for guidance through the maze of social, legal, governmental, and other agencies. Information and referral service can become as sophisticated as needed, employing technological devices and serving regions beyond usual local confines. It must be thoroughly integrated as "library work"; it is not a gimmick and has passed its initial trial. A gratifying side effect is that in using information and referral services, people discover the wonderful traditional resources of the library. Often the "information and referral" question actually proves to be a traditional request.

A rationale for I & R

Marsha Allen, a Branch Librarian who played a key role in helping to establish the concept and plans for information and referral service in the Detroit Public Library, put it this way:

> Library strength lies in locating, indexing, arranging and disseminating information. Most of this information has traditionally been in book form, but the Detroit Public Library has at various times undertaken "community information center" type activities. Its "War Information Center," for example, during World War II, served the practical needs of citizens whose lives were drastically affected by the wartime economy and the war itself. There has been a recent change in the type of demand made on our information stores. The information needs of today's city residents are oriented to a large degree toward basic human services and have not been identified and indexed in depth; nor have they been compiled in one central agency. Information and materials about services, public and nonpublic are fragmented, widely scattered, and in some cases almost unobtainable. New services develop continually. The Detroit Public Library must use its expertise, its skills, and its trained staff to be an information searching organization, dependent not only upon its own accumulated print resources, but upon its ability to search outside its walls for "non-book" information as well, to provide a single information tool available to the public. The library should be the first point of reference for any inquiry from city residents as a means of securing direction through the maze of agencies and organizations. It will not replace existing resources, but rather will develop the climate, the psychological trust and mutual respect within which collaboration, for the benefit of the individual citizen, can take place. It has overcome the limitations of a multitude of directories through application of professional indexing and cataloging skills. It will release professional personnel in other fields who are now engaged in what is essentially "library work," to operate their existing community agencies, and leave routines which require library skills in the hands of the library.

The need for information knows no social or economic lines, and applies to individuals and organizations alike. No one else in society is trained as librarians are to locate and make available information of all kinds. Librarians have classified and cataloged all printed knowledge of all times and places and have made it easily available, keeping it current, answering special needs with bibliographies and indexes. Interviewing skills have been highly developed in the daily practice of reference work. Several decades ago libraries reached beyond the printed word to embrace audiovisual materials, pushing back the traditional boundaries. Information and referral service makes a similar bid for inclusion, demanding that librarians systematize all information that is pertinent to our lives. It's a tall order; it is part of the profession's new/old arm of outreach, and it attends a bed-rock need.

Becoming indispensable

There is a lurking conviction, difficult to dislodge, that hovers over budget decisions concerning the public library, namely, a disbelief in the library's indispensability, which overrides appreciation of its desirability as a contributing institution. This secret conviction is the prime source of the unique financial threat to public libraries. It subverts the library's position in relation to other basic institutions under the aegis of local government. Thus, the public library fails the test of "proof of utility" (the university will lose its accreditation if its library does not meet minimum, measurable standards; the industrial library is inseparable from research and development, which lead to profits). In developing the hitherto unexploited dimension of information and referral service, the public library, at long last, can offer a service that responds to the life-size needs of the "75 to 85 percent"—proof of utility.

The extensive reference and research collections of our large city central libraries are not untouched by the turmoil of our times. The movement of population, business, and industry away from the core cities has meant that demands are being made on the central city libraries from large surrounding regions. These libraries, which cannot be duplicated around the state are, therefore, emphasizing their function as state resources and seeking additional state funds on this basis. Furthermore, there is thought being given now to their seeking recognition as national resources with accompanying federal financial subsidy. Attention of the nation has focused on the near financial collapse of the New York Public Library, the most dramatic case in point. The same elements of danger and need are present for all the urban public libraries of the nation.

In spite of the fact that in recent years universities have developed greater appreciation and a feeling of obligation regarding the communities in which they are located, university libraries cannot assume responsibility for service to the vast nonacademic populace. The central library collections are the repositories that nourish the intellectual and cultural life of the broad community, presently and for posterity. The changing cities have brought new challenges to the central libraries regarding their interaction with the public. It is not new for the subject departments to be involved with related professional and amateur organizations, but there is greater need now for an even more aggressive effort to acquaint today's public with the rich resources at hand and encourage their use.

Informal cooperation among libraries of all kinds is a long-standing practice, but in recent years additional, more formal ventures have come into being. The National Commission on Libraries and Information Science recommends national networking as the most effective means of disseminating information to all areas of our society. Regional and state networks are expanding interlibrary loan and sharing cataloging with state agencies heading a variety of cooperative functions. Consortia are being formed, some operating effectively for academic libraries and also beginning to embrace some large public library systems. Leadership by the state library in cooperative efforts similar to the consortia merits notice. The state library may have some unique advantages in its officially established network of libraries with their traditional cooperative practices, as well as in its present and potential avenues to state and federal funding.

Economic stringencies will force increased cooperation among all kinds of libraries. The sharing of resources between public and academic libraries is basic to all cooperative planning. Radical changes in Library of Congress services, and computer-based innovations all over the country will affect even the most remote public libraries. However, these developments have not taken place without some attendant problems. Conflict over copyright between authors and publishers on the one hand and librarians on the other is a complex problem that is damaging to all. Both groups are actually so closely allied and have so much in common that progress toward accommodation and a livable solution is urgent.

Getting into politics

In 1971, at the Midwinter ALA conference in Washington, D.C., Ralph Nader exhorted librarians to act on the conviction of the importance of libraries in a democracy. He stressed the potential power of our skills and our numbers to help effect needed changes in our society, and emphasized the absolute necessity of political activity by librarians on behalf of libraries. Librarians know their communities and are involved in local affairs, but in the past have functioned only minimally in politics. However, the recommended zero funding for libraries in the 1974 federal budget stimulated a rising political involvement in the interest of libraries. Tribute must be paid to the relatively small group of librarians all over the nation and to the Washington ALA staff, who through the years have fought for progressive library legislation; their accomplishments far out of proportion to their numbers. Widespread, vigorous political activity is required now to generate the power that both the Washington office and state associations need to prosecute favorable legislation. The unprecedented opportunity of a White House Conference on Libraries and Information Science will provide a national stage on which to dramatize the rich offerings of libraries, and a forum to foster popular understanding of library needs. However, a program of librarians talking to librarians contains none of the elements of success. Responsibility for imaginative planning and coordination falls to librarians, but the conference itself must be a citizens' experience in understanding libraries and seeking ways to assure their development. Concerned citizens can communicate wishes and demands to elected officials far more effectively than can library professionals. The White House Conference deserves vigorous support.

The information price tag

It has been noted that librarians have no problem of self-doubt regarding the essentiality of library service in our society. However, we have not yet comprehended the potential scope of the profession in relation to the new emphasis on planning for nationwide information service. The needs of corporate business and of complex social welfare organizations have caused information to be recognized and sought as an indispensable commodity—as if it were a commercial product. "Information science" has developed rapidly in response to this thrust, in large measure apart from the traditional library setting. It is incumbent upon librarians to foster acknowledgment of the fact that information, the old/new commodity, rests upon the bedrock of traditional library collections and services. Recognition of this reciprocal relation must be part of all national planning. National information needs are not only big, with a price tag, but small and individual, welling up from all levels of the populace.

The importance and potential of academic and public libraries in the new emphasis on information services will not be appreciated or used if librarians do not promote their own broadened role. The profession's solid confidence in its worth in the accustomed setting must be channeled now to energize and promote its distinctive services in the new realm. Local financing cannot be stretched to meet the implementation of national planning; consequently, librarians must work to assure reasonably adequate funding. Vigorous promotion of library services and interests must become a theme or slogan. Public librarians, always in a frontier position, identifying the needs and rights of the inclusive public they serve, will be required to give strong leadership in many areas of this promotion.

Not long before Margaret Martignoni's retirement as Executive Secretary of the New York Library Association, she wrote of her hope that it would be meaningful for librarians to come together in the fall conference to discuss their prospects and plans:

> This has been a rough year for libraries in New York State, as we know it has been in Michigan and other states, because of budget cutbacks and other problems. . . . We want to make certain that librarians do not lose heart during this grim period, but rather that they accept the challenge to rethink the library's role in present-day society, formulate new ways to build an informed electorate and demonstrate dramatically the value of free libraries to the survival of the democratic process.

These inspiring words constitute a charge not only to that New York conference, but apply in a broad sense to the entire profession.

It's the 10th anniversary of Doubleday Zenith Books. We're sorry it's not the 100th.

For too long, elementary and secondary school textbooks downplayed (when they didn't ignore) the contributions of America's minorities to American life. Things have changed during the past decade. Ten years ago, the first two Zenith Books were published: WORTH FIGHTING FOR, a history of blacks during the Civil War and Reconstruction, and A GLORIOUS AGE IN AFRICA, the story of three great African empires. Subsequent Zenith titles went on to cover the histories of Americans of Mexican, Japanese, Chinese, Jewish, Puerto Rican, and Native descent. The information gap started to close.

Zenith Books have now won the approval of parents, teachers, librarians, and critics from coast to coast. And hundreds of thousands of youngsters—many of them formerly unresponsive and bored—have acquired an appreciation of their own heritage, and an understanding for that of others. While it's too bad that Zenith Books haven't been around at least as long as Library Journal, the first decade is the beginning of many to come.

That's the total number of years the magazines of the R. R. Bowker Company have been serving subscribers and advertisers.

Joining the celebration of LIBRARY JOURNAL's 100th anniversary are the other three magazines in the Bowker family:

- PUBLISHERS WEEKLY has been a continuous source of information for the book world for 104 years. Today PW reaches 32,000 subscribers in 90 different countries with its national and international news of the publishing trade, reviews of forthcoming books, Spring and Fall Announcement issues, and interviews of leading book publishing figures and authors.

- SCHOOL LIBRARY JOURNAL has been serving children's, young adult, and school librarians for 22 years. Last year SLJ's circulation increased by 44%—to 43,400 subscribers—making it the magazine with the highest paid circulation in its field in the world. In addition to being the most comprehensive source of reviews of books for children and young adults, SLJ provides news, views, and informative articles on every facet of library service to young people.

- PREVIEWS, the youngest of our magazines, reaches 45,000 AV directors, media specialists, curriculum coordinators, teachers, and librarians with its news and features on non-print media. Over 1,500 critical, evaluative, reviews of audio-visual software are published each year to aid its readers in the AV selection process. The Audio-Visual Guide, a special feature of PREVIEWS, is published twice a year and is a compilation of advance listings of non-print media.

by Shirley Echelman

THE INITIAL QUANDARY faced by anyone attempting to forecast the important issues in special librarianship in the next ten to 20 years is that of definition. What is a special library and how does it differ from other libraries? The nature of the beast has been explored and debated at least since 1909, when John Cotton Dana and several colleagues founded the Special Libraries Association—an event arising in part from the refusal of ALA leaders to recognize that there were librarians around whose professional needs differed from those of public and college librarians, and their resulting decision not to allow formation of a group within ALA in which these needs could be addressed. Special libraries were not adequately defined then and, while several generations of students and practicing librarians since have wrestled with the problem, no satisfactory definition has yet emerged.

Still, some working parameters are necessary in order to understand which issues, if any, are unique to special librarians and which are shared by all librarians. Therefore, for this issue of Library Journal and for the length of time that it takes to read this article, let us agree that a special library can be defined as follows: a physical collection of information, knowledge, and/or opinion limited to a single subject or a group of related subjects or to a single format of information product or a group of related formats; organized under the aegis of an institution which provides funds for its continuance; administered by a librarian or a specialist in the subject or subjects covered; and carrying the mission of acquiring, organizing, and providing access to information and knowledge in furtherance of the goals of the parent institution. Exceptions spring to mind immediately, but most of the libraries I know of which group themselves as "special" display most of the characteristics described and all conform to the two most salient characteristics—that a parent institution exists, and that the library provides access to information in furtherance of the goals of the parent.

Despite these characteristics, which distinguish special libraries from their sister institutions; most of the important issues which seem to be emerging for special librarians do not appear to be unique to them. In fact, discussions with public and academic librarians and a considerable review of recent writing on the subject only reinforces the impression that there are few, if any, major emerging issues in the profession which do not engage all of its members to some degree.

Person power issues

There are two general groupings into which these issues can be organized for an overview of their relationship to one another. The first grouping is manpower (or personpower, as it will undoubtedly come to be called before the next decade ends); and this grouping is further divisible into two subsets—education for librarianship, and the utilization of trained professionals once that education is completed.

There is no doubt that special libraries have increased in number in the past 20 years—a perusal of succeeding editions of any directory of these institutions or of the membership statistics of SLA is conclusive evidence. Nor is there any reason to assume that this trend will be reversed during the next 20 years, although the rate of growth could certainly be altered by a prolongation of the current recession, and a severe economic depression in the industrialized world would probably invalidate all forecasts. Whether the special library of 20 years from now will be recognizable to librarians now practicing is a difficult question upon which I shall assay a comment later.

Special library education

The more immediate issue is whether future special libraries, whatever they may look like, will be staffed by people trained more or less as we have been trained and with whom we will be able to communicate as colleagues with a common background. This will depend greatly upon the kind of education for librarianship which is now developing and which will prevail in the next decade. Most special librarians agree that current library education does not prepare students adequately for our branch of the profession. There is much less agreement on what the specifics of training for special librarianship should be. But one certainty emerges; if librarians are to survive in special libraries in positions of responsibility, the content as well as the quality of library education must change.

Management, subject depth, and computers

Improved education in management techniques is the most urgently needed change. The more-or-less perfunctory surveys of this subject provided in most library schools are insufficient to prepare students for the responsibilities which special librarians must often undertake early in their careers because the road from the entry-level job to the manager's office is generally a shorter one than in other branches of the field. It is only slightly less urgent that increased opportunities for subject orientation be provided, and that the courses which provide these orientations be expanded to do more than review the bibliographic organization of the subject. Last, the special librarian of the future will need to be on terms of close acquaintanceship if not downright intimacy with the computer, and therefore, courses in computer sciences will continue to be valuable. It is my opinion that the library schools are making good progress in this last area and that current and recent students are receiving much better preparation in computer sciences than they are in the first two areas.

Since that vast majority of special libraries are now and will probably continue to be staffed by fewer than ten people, professional staff members usually perform a variety of duties. Therefore, student-librarians who are interested in special library careers need training in all three areas outlined above. What the special library will need in the future may well be a subject specialist who understands how to make the computer work for the library, who is at the same time a skilled practitioner of modern management techniques, and in addition has a working knowledge of the currently understood classic techniques of library science. Can the library schools produce such a paragon? The answer is "yes," if educational programs are re-designed, and if schools seek out and employ skilled teachers who are experts in their fields. However, it will be necessary to look outside the current library school faculty pool for many of these experts.

Recruiting

In addition to insisting upon changes in course structure and content, the profession as a whole must re-evaluate its recruitment philosophy if special libraries are going to be able to continue to draw staff from the graduate library schools. The library associations must undertake to provide accurate evaluations and forecasts of needs for graduate librarians in the fields they represent. The library schools should revise admissions procedures to reflect these evaluations and forecasts, and should recruit students with undergraduate and graduate backgrounds that meet the stated needs. Even more important, increased attention must be focused on the personality suitability of library school applicants. Special libraries are not now places where inflexible, retiring, or "bookish" personalities are likely to find success, and they will become even less so in the years to come, as the growing urgency for accurate and rapid information retrieval brings increased pressures to the library.

In addition to making sure that the library schools will be producing adequately-trained professionals for future positions in special libraries, those of us now practicing in the field should turn our attention to our own educational needs so that we can prepare ourselves for the changes that will be coming in our working environments. The nature of a profession such as librarianship is that change is certain; perhaps that is why the work of a professional is called "practice." It is increasingly characteristic of professionals that they need to update their knowledge and skills regularly. This is well-recognized in law and the medical sciences, and it is equally important in librarianship. Considerable progress has been made already in providing solid programs in continuing education. A number of universities provide post-graduate seminars in library and information science and some of the professional associations are involved in preparing and sponsoring educational programs by which interested librarians can update their knowledge and sharpen their skills. If continuing education is to be successful, however, a great deal of coordination still needs to be accomplished among the various current programs and some monitoring of quality and relevance should be attempted. In addition, a far broader array of educational opportunities is needed, and these must be made widely available throughout the country. Part of the need may be met in coming years by providing local groups of librarians with live or taped seminars and workshops.

"The search for librarians with solid backgrounds in such fields as the physical sciences and business, and with outgoing, analytical personalities is complicated by the fact that special librarians as a group have been and are still being underpaid in relation to the other professionals with whom they work"

Most urgently needed are programs covering the whole range of management and technical skills which are, as mentioned above, inadequate in current library school programs. For practicing librarians, it is also important that courses on new management techniques and tools be made available in timely fashion, and that they be accompanied by critical evaluations. It is discouraging that, while the recently published report of the National Commission on Library and Information Science mentions continuing education, the discussion is vague and reveals clearly that the Commission did not consider continuing education for librarianship to be a major priority.

Women's work

The search for librarians with solid backgrounds in such fields as the physical sciences and business, and with outgoing, analytical personalities is complicated by the fact that special librarians as a group have been and are still being underpaid in relation to the other professionals with whom they work. This is one of the most serious issues facing the profession at present. It is not likely to become less so in the next decade unless we recognize that it arises in large measure from the reality that the majority of special librarians are women; and that any work which is perceived as predominantly "women's work" is both undervalued and underpaid. It is sexism, pure and simple, that decrees that those who assemble, organize, and provide access to information in an information-hungry institution should be paid less than those who analyze the information provided or who act upon that analysis. This issue must come to engage the energies of our male colleagues whose current general reaction to its introduction into any discussion is embarrassment or denigration. They suffer from its effects almost as much as women do, in that over-all salaries in libraries are low compared to those in other intellectual and analytical professions.

Comptrollers of information

The second major grouping of issues to be addressed in this article concerns the changing relationships between special libraries and other institutions. In corporate libraries, which account for a significant segment of the special library community, some re-evaluation of the library's importance in the corporate structure is beginning to take place. Rapid changes in corporate interests accompanied by increased specialization of expertise can only accelerate in the next decade; and corporate libraries are being forced to confront the demands made by these conditions. Information resources and retrieval systems proliferate in every field of endeavor; a prominent member of the Information Industry Association recently estimated that the number of information-oriented data bases in business and the sciences retrievable on time-sharing terminals would quadruple before 1985. The very abundance of these systems will tend to complicate decisions that have to be made about the search for information. There is growing evidence of increasing realization by management that it must depend more and more on its information specialists for these decisions. The continued success, perhaps even the existence of special libraries in corporations, is going to depend on whether the librarians are perceived by management as comptrollers of whatever information is available outside the institution as well as that which is collected within its walls. If librarians do not expand their role as the links between the institution and information, it is a fairly safe prediction that the credibility of the library as a source for information will suffer a severe blow. It is an even safer bet that any such loss in credibility will inevitably be followed by a loss of funding for the library.

Cost control

Anxieties engendered by the number and size of financial commitments which these sophisticated systems involve are balanced by the interesting and exciting change in the way in which corporate managers are beginning to view their librarians. We are becoming the specialists who cope with the complexities of information retrieval, who build resource-sharing networks to hold costs down, who explore other means of filling information needs without emptying corporate pockets. Management needs people who can do this kind of thing in all sorts of jobs and on levels that have not been open to librarians in the past; and this means that alternate career ladders are opening in such areas of endeavor as market research, corporate planning, consumer/corporate relations, and operations management. Especially in service industries and areas where specific technological expertise is not involved, the ability to retrieve, organize, and evaluate and to relate this evaluation to the company's business will increasingly provide librarians with a wider choice of career goals. Such a broadening is certain to impact favorably on salaries by demonstrating the comparability of information-related professions such as economic analysis, market planning and research, operations analysis, computer sciences, and information science.

Proprietary protection

Special libraries have long been distinguished by the ease and informality with which they have shared resources with one another, while protecting the proprietary interests of their parent institutions. How these informal arrangements can be related to the many networks now in the dreaming and planning is a question which will engage the interest of the profession during the coming years. That special libraries should and must become part of this fabric of information service has only recently been accepted by the information community, and many librarians still see special libraries mainly as users of network services and not as contributors to them. This view is a serious mistake, I think, and its acceptance as a basis for action would result in the impoverishment of the information base available to the community as a whole.

The problem of protecting proprietary information is soluble; indeed, special librarians have been solving it on an ad hoc basis for decades. There seem to be no compelling arguments to the contrary which remain insurmountable upon close scrutiny. Certainly, a profession which can fathom the complexities of the ALA Filing Rules for Catalog Cards should be able to figure out how to tap the enormous riches represented by special collections for the good of the community at large.

Related to the problem of bringing special libraries into library networks is the need for a solution to the copyright controversies currently poisoning the relations between publishers and librarians. That these traditional allies now face one another across a widening rift of interests is tragic, and we must find a reasonable compromise before an unreasonable one is imposed upon us from the outside. This may take years of further effort of the most strenuous kind on the part of both parties, and the reservoirs of good will built over the past hundred years will need to be tapped in order to arrive at a workable solution. Nonetheless, the effort must be continued; since failure could easily result in the demise of publishing as a viable industry, or the starvation of libraries, or both. I'm afraid that it will take some time before librarians truly accept the hard fact that information access is going to cost us all a lot more than it has in the past. I'm also afraid that the current intransigence of most members of the publishing industry will only contribute to the difficulty of arriving at a reasonable compromise. The professional associations will necessarily have to assume leadership roles in negotiating a solution to the copyright controversy; the danger here is that one association will take unilateral action without consulting the others, thereby weakening the librarians' case unnecessarily.

Professional leadership must also be extended to other areas in which the vital interests of librarians are involved, such as how and when publicly-funded information and research results are made available for public use. The related issues here are numerous and need little additional discussion—government publishing and printing activities, and the role of the "information industry" in the sale of that information to the public.

This article has attempted to outline the major issues which special librarians, indeed all librarians, will face in the next decade; none of these are new to readers of this or any other professional journal, and none of them will be solved either quickly or easily. It would be fruitless to attempt any prophesy of the solutions. I have not discussed other issues more or less technical in nature, such as the need for standardization of microfilm and microfiche and the equipment upon which they are read, improvement in the kinds of information provided to potential buyers by the reprint publishers, and operational reorganization and refunding of the Government Printing Office.

One of the purposes of this issue of Library Journal is to describe the special library of 20 years from today; that is a task which few, if any, practicing special librarians are suitably endowed with ESP powers to do. Certainly I am not. I can no more envision what the special library will look like in 1996 or 2006 than Melvil Dewey could foretell the impact of Boolean Alegbra on information retrieval in 1876. A few trends can be discerned and no more. Information retrieval and computer technology are irretrievably wedded, and there is no reason in the world to expect a divorce. The paper document will be considerably less common, having been replaced by more efficiently-produced and easily-restored formats such as microfilm, fiche, and magnetic tape. The special librarian will probably be called an "information specialist" or an "information manager." Nevertheless, whatever the title, he or she will be involved in many tasks which we will continue to recognize; although the technology with which these tasks are performed will be somewhat foreign to us. Information will still need to be acquired, organized, and retrieved. I think much of the organization, that is cataloging, classifying and indexing, will be done by private companies or government agencies organized to do this specific job and staffed by information specialists. Information retrieval centers will be staffed by information specialists and managed by information managers, whose job will be the acquisition of relevant bibliographic and informational data bases as well as the documents to which they refer; and most important, the interface with users which is an extension of today's reference work—the analysis of requests for information, the preparation of search strategies for retrieving what is needed, and the presentation of the search results in a usable mode. The information manager will no doubt have many responsibilities toward his or her parent institution which will not differ in kind from similar responsibilities in 1976. The technology will change and urgency of the need for information will increase.

Perhaps it is wish-fulfillment, but I also believe that the importance of information to successful performance will make the information center the hub of the enterprise, whether it is a corporation, a research institution, or a government department. The prospect is a little awesome and more than a little challenging; but I view it with equanimity as I sit behind my desk in 1976. The profession has already begun preparation for these changes; most of the problems are already being worked on to some degree—and besides, I'm due to retire in 1990.

Over 8,000,000 American children and teenagers—nearly a quarter of all those in school today—have some recognizable reading difficulty.

That's why Doubleday Signal Books were developed. Although they are within the reading capabilities of children who read at the fourth grade level, they are concerned with things which nine to fourteen-year-olds care about.

Doubleday Signal Books have been endorsed by scores of leading educators and librarians who have seen how they motivate and excite reluctant readers. There are now 69 titles to choose from—mystery stories, tales of adventure, biographies of people whose lives have special meaning for young people today.

That spirit is one of freedom of language, openness, a readiness to experiment. It affirms contemporaneity. The independent publisher—also called the small press, alternative press, little magazine—is not chained to economic, corporate vagaries, but instead is a lifestyle, a vital cultural part which recycles and rejuvenates the tribal energies of print.

The list on the left was drawn from one heading in the Subject Index of our Eleventh International Directory of Little Magazines and Small Presses. It's just a sample.

INTERNATIONAL DIRECTORY OF LITTLE MAGAZINES AND SMALL PRESSES

Eleventh Edition [1975-76]

This Directory has been used the world over by librarians, writers, students of contemporary literature, creative writing classes and others as a guide to small and underground magazines, presses and papers. It contains such important data as price, circulation, frequency, type of material used, payment rates, rights, discount schedules, size, personal statements by editors, number of issues/books published 1974 and expected in 1975, etc. It has been called "The first and by far the best..." by Bill Katz ("Guide to the Underground," Magazine Selection, R.R. Bowker Co., NY). Choice says it's "...the most comprehensive and detailed listing of non-establishment periodicals,...that rarity among reference books, a directory that is a delight to read."

THE YEAR? 1876.

That's when Library Journal published its first issue. And the year the ALA was established.

Librarians then, as now, found Encyclopaedia Britannica a rich source of information. It helped thoughtful Americans keep up with national affairs, as well as the history, science and arts of the world.

Over the next 100 years, the information explosion will continue to mushroom—making it all the more vital that people have immediate access to our accumulated knowledge.

As long as there is information, libraries are the place where it will be kept. And as long as there is a need to know, librarians will be the people who give us access to the facts.

At Britannica, we've seen the dawning of every educational innovation since America was a crown colony. But none more auspicious than the contributions made by America's librarians—and the Library Journal which speaks for them.

Educational challenges will multiply during the next century. And Britannica will be on hand to help you meet them. (It's the oldest continuously published reference work in the English language.)

We'll never stop working on new ways to collect, relate and share information. Because you'll never outgrow your need for facts.

That's the Britannica Spirit of '76.

Libraries for Tomorrow's Children: a Grim Fairy Tale

ONCE UPON A TIME school librarians (also known as school media specialists) knew there was no place to go but up. That they certainly had been down was a matter of record in the seminal report issued at the time of our country's first centennial. Public Libraries in the United States of America, Part I, 1876 Report included among its fascinating information a chapter, perhaps prophetically, entitled "School and Asylum Libraries." Its introductory paragraph sets the tone to which librarians have long grown accustomed, a kind of sanctimonious regard for the value of libraries, akin to other respectable institutions. The rest of the chapter, however, belies the notion that the school library is high on the list of desired cultural agencies.

The report laconically states the dangers and failures which have been the underlying causes for the less than successful story of school library development. Were a report to be issued for 1976 the list would be, not surprisingly, similar. Reasons for the unhappy condition of school libraries in 1876 were due to defects both of legislation and of administration. Under the former some of the problems included "suspending at intervals the grants of the State . . . and in not cultivating interest in the libraries by holding trustees and other school officers to a more strict accountability for their management and preservation."

Defects of administration included, among others, "placing the libraries in the charge of teachers whose interest in the school and library alike terminated with the close of the school term . . . by allowing the libraries to sink into neglect and contempt through failure to provide regular supplies of fresh reading . . . by a like indifference, in too many cases, on the part of town and county superintendents . . ."

The remainder of the chapter gives thumbnail sketches of the common school libraries in each of 21 states out of a possible 37 in existence then. In view of the shambles that is currently New York City's school libraries, it gives one almost physical pain to read that New York, listed first, "was the pioneer in founding school libraries." The passage of a law permitting voters to levy a tax for beginning and sustaining a school library was met mostly by apathy and indifference. Of further negative consequence was the diversion of monies appropriated to other than library uses. A superintendent's prediction in 1840 that "any diversion of the library fund to any other purpose, in any case, and under any circumstances, would lead to the destruction of the libraries, seems to be fully verified." (Let us now bow our heads to pray for deliverance from the new method of federal funding, noncategorical and revenue-sharing. This method pits all the needy against each other while the government just waits for the most ruthless fighter to win.)

The other states offered more and more reason for an increasing despair. The report reads: "The school libraries have been superseded by free town libraries" and "Very few public school libraries have been formed in. . ." and "Annual reports of the State superintendent do not indicate that any action has been taken to institute such libraries" and "No school libraries are yet reported" under the various state descriptions.

One must look to the status of education in general to determine whether school libraries were simply considered peripheral or whether a basic philosophy regarding strong financial support to education is really an inherent concern of our democratic heritage.

by Lillian L. Shapiro

Tantalizing goals

Even a superficial survey of the history of education in this country brings the realization that the goals of schooling have been the shaping of children who were pious and conforming. The materials required for such an education were few and the "teacher" could be almost anyone. Without accepting the entire thesis of the book, one is persuaded by Richard Hofstadter's Anti-intellectualism in American Life that the American brand of education has been more utilitarian and moralistic than academically stimulating. Hofstadter describes the scene as it was in the 19th Century: "Americans would create a common-school system but would balk at giving it adequate support. They would stand close to the vanguard among the countries of the world in the attempt to diffuse knowledge among the people, and then engage drifters, and misfits as teachers and offer them the wages of draymen."

Improvements resulted from the unrelenting criticism of such leaders as Horace Mann and Joseph M. Rice whose dreams of a better education for children made them adversaries of the system as they observed it. But even those reformers would have to sell their ideas about change to those whose power and influence were needed to bring about those changes. The rationale, then as it is now, was in the practical dividends to be derived from education, not in the setting of intellectual fires in the minds of the young.

Leaping into the 20th Century with the improvements in the standard of living brought by technological advances, measured more by indoor plumbing than household libraries, almost two-thirds of all elementary schools were without centralized libraries as recently as 1962.

There were no audible champions, aside the library profession itself, campaigning to correct the deficiencies. The impetus for improvement in school libraries came to the secondary schools as a dramatic result of our competition in space with Russia. The educational goals became very explicit—and implicit. Since John Dewey's time a tug-of-war had existed between Progressivism and Conservatism (back to basics) in education, this amid an olio of theories regarding "transfer of training," "learning to learn," and arts and science vs. vocational/career education. Underlying these confrontations and see-saw changes has been the basic distrust of academic and intellectual brilliance which, carried to its most ludicrous extreme, has classified with exceptional children (meaning the blind, the deaf, the speech-defective, the physically handicapped), the unusually gifted child.

Sputnik suddenly changed that and our high school libraries acquired materials for the sciences, mathematics, and foreign languages with funds made available through the National Defense Education Act (NDEA). Prior to that the requests made to local and state sources had made no perceptible difference in school libraries existing on minimal budgets and with science collections which were woefully outdated.

Rolling stones

The laborious task of pushing school libraries up hill to a level more closely approaching even the 1945 standards (School Libraries for Today and Tomorrow) was moderately alleviated by the NDEA support. The weight of need depressing school library development was more visibly lightened by the passage of the Elementary and Secondary Education Act (ESEA) in 1965, motivated by a belated concern for minority groups and the education of our children. This was probably the most important single factor in improving school libraries, making them financially able to effect the transmogrification from "library" to "media center" in states across the nation. (For all the excitement engendered by the Knapp School Libraries Project, 1963-1968, and the changes wrought in the Knapp project schools, very little nationwide improvement was evident as a consequence. In fact, the project schools themselves were not able to maintain the gains made. Remaining at that level of achievement would have necessitated local and state support to replace the special funding which had come from private philanthropy. This simply does not happen after pilot programs have consumed their grants and thus have many worthwhile programs met their end.)

The Midas touch

Those years in the 1960s seemed full of promise and the Sleeping Beauty (school library) was brought to life by a kiss from the Handsome Prince (federal funding). They will not necessarily live happily ever after in this fairy tail, however. The funds which school libraries have come to depend on for their very existence have now metamorphosed from the titles of ESEA which were expressly intended for media resources to Title IV-B which is to support Libraries and Learning Resources, a state-based program with local education agencies having complete control over the expenditure of those funds. Purposes to which the monies may be applied include school library resources, instructional equipment, testing, programs of guidance and counseling, all of which will be consolidated by 1977—and woe to the ones who are not in there shoving for attention. In an age where technology has hypnotized us, I am not sanguine that school libraries will get the lion's share. Getting even the lamb's share may be problematic in view of the recession, inflation, and general malaise of our economy.

In Futures in School Finance: Working Toward a Common Goal (proceedings of a conference sponsored jointly by the Institute for Educational Finance and Phi Delta Kappa on March 17-19, 1974) there is a chapter ominously called "The End of the Rainbow." The author of that chapter, Robert D. Reischauer of The Brookings Institution, states that for the next decade federal funding has reached a point where political and fiscal requisites for expansion of support to education are simply not present. There are few programs in which a significant number of those affected are considered useful by Congress. Results from past expenditures have been disappointing. Inflation and demands for tax cuts, will erode any favorable balance existing at the national level. Public school enrollment is expected to fall by 11 percent in 1980 and, says Reischauer, "From a purely political perspective it is interesting to note that the fraction of the population enrolled in public schools will be dropping to close to the lowest point of this century. This means that a smaller and smaller portion of each Congressman's constituency will have a child in the public school system and thus a direct stake in increased federal aid." The picture becomes grimmer when one reads his further counsel that energies should be directed to the state government where the necessary resources will be in greater abundance. The apocalyptic headlines in the daily newspapers make that rescue seem remote. Current unemployment statistics are a further sign of the economic disarray. A survey conducted by the National Education Association in 1967 indicated a shortage of teacher applicants. At this point there are at least 24 states with an excess of teachers.

Unionism has added to the cost of education but will remain an important and necessary protection for employees. The money crunch will move union concerns, one hopes, from demands for more money to other equally appropriate ones. Imperatives exist in professional unions that do not affect industrial unions such as those in the automobile industry. Pay in a profession like teaching may have limits greater than those for industrial workers tied into production which generates money. Educators' productivity is different and educational goals, therefore, must be less materialistic. The motives which have brought people into teaching and librarianship are not the same as those which have motivated businessmen.

While union solidarity is necessary, it is not synonymous with rigidity. Teachers, including school librarians, in unions will face recurring responsibilities which distinguish them from other labor organizations. A provocative illustration was the special membership meeting of the Actors Equity Association on August 25, 1975, at which more than 600 actors voted against a code handed down to them by the union's ruling council. The membership felt that the code would have been destructive of important principles in their profession.

The two teachers' organizations, National Education Association (NEA) and American Federation of Teachers (AFT), will continue to discuss merger but there is already evidence of conflict at the national level, although a few state organizations have merged, such as the New York State United Teachers. The most recent figures indicate that the NEA has a membership of 1,467,186 (an increase of 300,983 in the years 1973 and 1974). The June 1975 membership of the AFT, as reported in their newspaper, is just over 453,000 (a gain of 38,800 between May, 1974 and May, 1975). If it is accurate that there are three million teachers, that leaves one million still unorganized. The NEA, more militant than it used to be and still clinging to some of the "ideals" of the profession, may increase its lead over the AFT in the next decade. A rising public disaffection with militant public service employees is apparent. The law of diminishing returns may be taking effect.

Demographic trends

A recent story tells of a corporation personnel director hiring new top management people. He asked each applicant the sum of two plus two. The man whose answer was three was appointed comptroller, the one who said five was made advertising director. The applicant who replied, "What would you like it to be?" became the company economist. Predictions about the future are, of course, based on such "knowns" as the birth rate, economic issues, and extrapolations from current political and social conditions. The mix can turn out in a variety of ways depending on the philosophy of the predictor. In projecting the estimated population for 1980 through 1990, the United States Statistical Abstract lists four different figures depending on varying numbers of births per 1000 women. In 1973 net population growth in the U.S. was 7.2 percent compared to 18.3 percent in post-World War II 1947, and 18.1 percent in 1956. The most frequently quoted ratio for population growth is 1.8 children per 1000 women of child-bearing age.

On the other hand, a team of California demographers expect a "mini" baby boom as women in the age range of 24-34 who have thus far remained childless decide it must be now or possibly never. Birth rates also vary according to the social and economic conditions of specific groups. White middle-class families have remained smaller than those of ethnic minorities. Decisions about the size of families have changed as second and third generations have entered the middle-class with its goals of career education, demanding longer years of education, and a growing list of possessions and luxuries. The total population increases include the growing number of those who are over 65 years of age. In the 1870s they were about three percent of the total population; in the 1970s they are over 10 percent. The increase in the number of aged may have most immediate significance for the public library, but schools must also take note of that part of the public in their community relationships.

Fiscal restraints

The amount of money available for education, which has been less than a quarter of that spent by the federal government on defense, will be limited as cities and states struggle with problems of increased services without new sources of income. The school tax, directly voted and therefore most vulnerable, is not popular. Attempts to equalize educational opportunity by way of statewide distribution of tax monies will move slowly and may, by 1990, become federally-based to overcome the disparity between states in their economic health.

On the national scene, the future is complicated by food and energy crises, detente, and other international constraints. All of these have economic consequences for education—as well as political ones—and may, indeed, have mortal ones for the world.

These trends color the immediate future of education gray. Indications are appearing that curriculum planners and school boards will be emphasizing the basic considerations of learning—reading, writing, and computation—and there is a return to vocational and career education, echoing the 1940s. This conservatism will be reflected in smaller library budgets for the schools.

One high-cost school expense that may be saved in the 1990s is transportation. As communities become increasingly conscious of the cost of scrambling children throughout the city to achieve integration, along with the wear and tear on both black and white children, the parents will finally accept the clear need for integrated housing, and the beloved neighborhood school will reappear—in the same old buildings.

Television will be a growing concern for all educators as the screen size grows larger and we truly come closer to the totalitarian possibilities depicted in Fahrenheit 451. This will not be a matter simply of the death of the book and reading but a death of the mind and thinking. School librarians will join the ranks of those whose purpose it is to conserve a necessary past.

Sins of omission

Mythology tells us that Tantalus, Sisyphus, and Midas were punished for their sins. If the neglect school librarians endure is a punishment, it must be for sins of omission rather than commission. Perhaps, in the next two decades, we can attend to these matters: We have not insisted that teacher training of courses include the study of materials and services available in school libraries. Librarians have not been dynamic teachers themselves. We have not made it clear to guidance counselors that library service is not the profession for the shy and reclusive. We have not set up barriers to prevent the teacher who dislikes the classroom from entering librarianship, which is the classroom raised to the nth degree. We have not integrated our work with that of the public library young adult and children's specialists. We have not made ourselves visible in the school (outside the architectural entity called "library") and in the community.

The result has been that we are overlooked in all those places where our name, like Abou Ben Adhem's, should head the list. The New York Times "Spring Survey of Education" (May 4, 1975) carried lengthy articles about individualized learning, reading, and alternative education, with no mention of the terms "school library" or "media center." The report of the National Commission on the Reform of Secondary Education, which will carry much weight with school administrators, includes two sentences about media centers and encases them under the heading "New Roles for Public Libraries."

Our invisibility has been tantamount to disappearance in terms of impact on both the formulation and implementation of educational theories. Pilot programs, specially funded projects, and federally financed "innovations" have enabled media centers to be established, but no thrilling "Eureka," has rent the heavens to attest to the proof that this richly equipped laboratory of resources has helped to ameliorate the problems which have been mentioned above.

The media center at the school building level will continue to strive mightily to offer all the formats of information that budgets permit. This will be a major achievement, since the sensible merging of the two national organizations which are concerned with media in learning, the American Association of School Librarians (AASL) and the Association for Educational Communications and Technology, (AECT) does not appear to be forthcoming. In spite of the new statement of standards, which rests so much more easily on the hearts of the technologist that a full-page advertisement is placed in the official publication of the AECT. The innate resistance to the unified concept is evident in an editorial carried in the September 1975 issue of Audiovisual Instruction. The question asked: Should the media and library (sic) operations be unified? AECT's Howard Hitchens' clear and unequivocal response, "Well, maybe . . . that depends. . ."

Schools of all sizes have been moving in the direction of the unified center, but the next ten years may show a narrower gap between rhetoric and reality as more practicing librarians become active participants in the planning committees, seminars, annual conferences, and standards committees than has been true heretofore. For a start, the language will mature. We have had a surfeit of advice from professors of education and supervisory personnel who have not spent time in the recent past in direct involvement with the "user," that nebulous human who, in real life, has a host of hyperkinetic, troubled, chameleon-like characteristics. It may become a requisite for continuing service in the school, for teachers and school librarians to go back to the source at regular intervals. As with Antaeus, the strength of one's educational philosophy is derived from the day-to-day testing of its theories.

Educating the new practitioner

There will be more common cause exhibited between the teacher and the school librarian through stronger efforts to bring their training and education into closer alignment. Both of these educators will have academic strengths derived from an eclectic undergraduate education with a major specialty and will take the same courses in educational psychology and pedagogy, with emphasis on internship in a variety of settings. Both will have courses in materials of whatever formats are in use. School librarians will need some course work in simple cataloging and reference materials. Those planning on secondary school employment will require more sophisticated reference knowledge. In the main teachers and school librarians should be virtually interchangeable and able to perform in either milieu—the classroom or the center—and certainly in the public arena, the community. Courses in public finance and social structures are imperative.

Such needs as production and graphics are separate specialties and require other personnel, just as the addition of equipment to the media center's holdings requires the presence of technicians. Paraprofessionals and/or volunteers will handle clerical and routine procedures of circulation, typing, filing, custodial matters, duplicating, and so forth. Paid student help will be utilized. (If students are willing to offer their services for some of the drearier drudgery out of love for the school or the librarian, that is pleasant. Let us make it clear to them, however, that the work they are doing is not pre-vocational for school librarianship.)

Because of the bleak financial future, it is unlikely that schools will be setting up television studios or other manifestations of advanced technology. Teachers and school librarians will know about and use portapak television equipment and other devices requiring smaller investments than the more elegant set-up of a studio et al.

Sub-standard staff

Staffing will not meet the requirements recommended by the latest standards. In fact, few will meet the quantitative ratio recommended in the 1945 statement—one professional for each 500 students, plus a clerical assistant for each 1000.

Knee-jerk degree requirements

If we continue the knee-jerk reflex of demanding a college degree even where there is no discernible application of that education on the job (and no remuneration for the added preparation), we may see the emergence of a variety of new routes to the classroom or school library. This will be especially true if the inflated educational requirement is applied to certification, which attests only to time spent in artificially mandated course work. (That sound offstage was a bellow from all the vested interests which stand to lose by such experiments.)

Materials will show the same variety we now see, but with more paperback books in the print collection. With less money to spend, the paperback, especially for recreational reading, will replace a major portion of the fiction, science fiction, mysteries, "junior" novels, and other resources that have shorter shelf lives. Where budgets are stronger—and there are still going to be affluent communities that can afford all the goodies—videotape cartridges may appear, particularly if TV specials and documentary programs are available for purchase. Schools may join networks like the Ohio College Library Center and this will save cataloging time. Networks which include public libraries in the school district will give both the school and the public library more mileage out of their holdings. Films will be handled this way or through cooperatives of schools, similar to the Board of Cooperative Educational Services.

The new librarians

The next ten years should open library positions to younger practitioners through the retirement of a large percentage of those now in the 50-55 age group. There is little available data on age levels of current library professionals, but there is a visible paucity of young faces. In the 1980s, beginning school librarians would have been born in the 1950s, would have been in high school during the campus crises of the 1960s (will they remember?), and been young adults during Vietnam and Watergate (will that have changed them?). Some will have worked in non-academic fields because of the recession of the 1970s. Their preparation for school librarianship may not include a Master's degree in Library Science, but a variety of educational experiences bringing them into contact with children and young adults, and probably some background information in political science and community studies.

This new breed, reading in one of their few library courses, about the Congress for Change and the Atlantic City ALA conference, will perform as true librarians, challengers of that which is dishonest and promoters of the kind of education which stresses questioning the status quo, the quid pro quo and the quo vadis. If we can take heart from the latest yearbook of the Association for Supervision and Curriculum Development, Schools in Search of Meaning, that kind of school librarian will find allies among the other teachers.

Media without messages

We who have been surrounded by mountains of materials, all bursting with information and signals about possible dangers facing us, have paid little heed to the message (because we are bedazzled by the medium?). A more serious "culpa" to consider is that all too often we have regarded those materials as so many products, as if we were in charge of a supermarket. The school librarian of the future will have to be more catalyst and less cataloger.

There is a frightening similarity to the early 1930s in what is now taking place. Will we, as educators and citizens, be able to change the scenario? Can we stop the trend toward propping up economic breakdown by military spending? It seems almost ludicrous to discuss the future of libraries when the future of all of us hangs by so tenuous a thread. Let us hope with Marianne Moore that "as contagion of sickness makes sickness, contagion of trust can make trust."

Like Cassandra, a messenger bringing unwelcome tidings courts unpleasant consequences. What are the alternatives? Like all teachers, we will always derive the greatest satisfaction from stirring up inert minds, from reorganizing latent ability, from pursuing ways to a better life with our students. As we celebrate our Bicentennial, we must remember that the ideals enunciated at the birth of this country have yet to be achieved. Those gains are still absent from the lives of a great many Americans and people all over the world. The likelihood of a tricentennial will be deeply affected by how Americans respond to this responsibility.

I'm not lighting any great rockets to celebrate school library success in 1976—but maybe we can make it before 1984. We'd better.

Alexander Solzhenitsyn's

LENIN IN ZURICH

This literary portrait combines the suppressed Chapter 22 of August 1914 with chapters from Solzhenitsyn's eagerly awaited books October 1916 and March 1917 to produce a compelling psychological picture of the patron saint of the Russian Revolution. Intolerant of his fellow revolutionaries and contemptuous of the Russian masses, Lenin emerges not as the distant, omniscient leader and theoretician but as a man of human proportions, with human needs, weaknesses, and concerns. This is a landmark book by one of the most important writers of our time.

IS IT TRUE that you think that predicting the future is humbug?

Yes.

Why?

Because nobody can foresee the contradictory circumstance that can arise, because most predictions—especially those made across the last 100 years of public library service in this country—are unfulfilled projections of the hopes or wishes of the people who made them, and because predictions for anything usually come larded with the sort of wicked generalization I've just made.

If that's what you think of prediction, why did you agree to John Berry's request that you supply an article for LJ on the future of public library services to children and young adults?

Because it affords a never-to-be equaled opportunity to point out to the biggest audience of librarians I ever expect to reach that there is no such thing as "the future of public library services . . ." by itself. There is a future for all locally directed cultural, educational, and social services. All of them, and all of the services as well as the standards of services rendered, are now tied to the same economic see-saw of national and regional boom or bust periods. Until or unless these services are guaranteed per capita support that is stabilized against inflation/recession, distributed by the federal government and added to the vagaries of local funding, there is no reason to suppose that the future of work in schools, museums, galleries, hospitals, and social service agencies will be very different from the past or present. In the case of public library services to children and young adults, past experience and current conditions show that in a stable economic period, an increased portion of a public library's increased budget will go to services for minors, new or extended service programs will be encouraged, staffs will be expanded, and funds for departmental collections will go up. During periods of economic recession, public library budgets go down, new or extended services to minors are jettisoned or cut back to the vanishing point, staffs are reduced, and funds for new purchases are drained off to satisfy the demands made by tax-paying adults on their specialized service departments. It's always been "Ten miles forward, eight miles back" in the 85-year history of departmentalized public library services to minors. The pattern will repeat itself until the method of funding for all cultural, educational, and social service agencies is changed and until the futurists of these fields can convince themselves and their legislators that children and young adults are priority service points.

Will children's and young adult services become "priority service points" in public libraries of the future?

The answer has to be, "Yes and No." If you're talking about major urban public libraries, the answer is, "No!" If you're talking about small and medium-sized city libraries and county library systems, the answer is, "Yes." Even in this current stretch of recession, the advances in, and the maintainance of, public library services to minors in smaller cities and county systems far outstrip the performances of the major urban libraries. These smaller units of library service are not suffering to the same debilitating degree, the confusion of goals and purpose that has afflicted our major urban libraries since 1929. These smaller units do not expect to be great centers of scholarly research, or house all-inclusive information sources, as well as provide personal reader services all at one and the same time. They enjoy a greater degree of public support because they can respond more quickly to demands for new or extended public services and can modify existing practices and procedures to take advantage of shared costs in acquisition and agree on subject specialization in unit collections. They actually search out new and better ways to serve their patrons. The adult patrons of these units generally claim that they stay in their smaller cities or suburbia because of the advantages afforded to their children. Schools usually get mentioned first, of course, but here are the public libraries where preschool story hours have been restored by public demand when public library boards have tried to reduce this service to fit reduced budgets. These are the units where programming and services to young adults are growing at the very time when major urban libraries are lopping off this service specialty or allowing it to erode. These are the public library units best prepared to take advantage of regional networking for sophisticated information services. These are the public library units for new children's librarians and YA librarians who want career ladders. That's where the best future possibilities are for work within their specialties and for career advancement.

Why are you laughing?

I just remembered that Mr. Berry has invited some major urban library directors to share their 2¢ worth on the future of their institutions and how very much I want-

Public Library Services to Children and YA's

by Lillian N. Gerhardt

ed when I was a 21-year-old librarian to tell all such directors that they ought to get their damn priorities together before they speak individually for all public library needs and concerns. They were being outclassed in shared or cooperative procedures and in services to minors by the counties and smaller city libraries even then and that was over 20 years ago. But, they're still sought out as the pacesetters and standard bearers for public library services. Laughing is better than crying.

Well, now that you're well on your way to being an old croc, what do you want to predict about the future of major urban library services to children and young adults?

I deny that I am predicting. I am pointing out subjective probabilities. The major urban public libraries' forward thrust in business reference, in adult education, in services to minors was lost before and during the Great Depression and their initial leadership in these specialities has never been recovered. It's not that nobody noticed. It's just that very few people inside or outside public library service have been willing to believe it and have worked to reverse irreversible trends instead of confronting realities and setting new goals.

Boston Public Library, New York Public Library, Cleveland Public Library, Chicago Public Library, St. Louis Public Library, and San Francisco Public Library are all perfect examples of why major urban libraries ought to get out of the business of direct services to children and young adults. None of them are providing reasonable levels of support for service in these specialties, all of them have wasted the services of some of the best children's and young adult coordinators in the country by ignoring them, and none of them come even close to providing equivalent career benefits and opportunities available to school librarians almost anywhere. Whenever the combination of public and school library services to children and young adults comes up, and it has at intervals ever since ALA's 1879 national conference devoted to the discussion of the possibility of library work with children, it's usually proposed as the best possible, least costly method of insuring these services in rural areas unable to afford both a school and a public library. Now, the children and young adults in major urban areas are the ones who would gain the greatest benefit from a combination of services by librarian specialists.

If this happens, how will it work?

First of all, if it were to happen, it would be over the dead and dying bodies of the children's and YA library careerists in major public libraries, who (in addition to emotional addiction to the team they've been losing on) know darn well that they cannot transfer in dominant roles from one institutional bureaucracy to the other. However, give them some surcease from continuous questioning of the need for their special training and their status as professionals, lay a few years of better pay, opportunities for advancement, assured access to federal funding or project grants, and they'll simmer down to the provision of better total library services to minors while moving between public library branches and school library media centers.

Then, you see the school libraries as the units that will take over the direct library services to children and young adults?

Yes. Not because I want to, but because I have to. Coordinators of children's and YA services are not being replaced in major public library systems. State consultants in these service specialties are not being replaced even where the county libraries call for them because the major urban public libraries, their children and YA specialists included, wrongheadedly refused to acknowledge that they ever needed them, too, and the major urban library directors still have the state legislative clout. Therefore, we've had ten years of watching a commanding career level in public library services being erased. The administrative capacity and experience will be with the school district librarians.

If the children's librarians and the YA librarians move between the public schools and the public libraries' branches in major urban areas, then what will the public libraries' voice or role be?

An exchange of services. The central library will supply materials examination services, acquisition, and cataloging; the public school system will direct and be responsible for all library services to children of every age in its district, those in school, pre-school, or institutionalized—and the public library would be able to order them up at any point that the schools might get too overconcerned with school libraries or curriculum support. They'll watch dog each other, as they always should have, but haven't.

But what will happen to the established collections in the central children's rooms of major urban public libraries if they contract the direct services from the schools?

This has to be an Either/Or answer. Either the major urban libraries will seize the chance to establish the nonselective historical and on-going inclusive collections of materials for children they don't provide now, that are not provided by colleges or universities or the Library of Congress/Or they will miss the boat again just as they have since 1895 at every chance to turn their central library children's collections from highly selective, discovery areas for the use of children into scholarly resources for the use of students in every branch of study. This would call for curators, specialist bibliographers and catalogers, and agreements between major cities about areas of responsibility for specialized collecting—all without the pitter patter of little feet, which have never been entirely welcome in major urban libraries' marble halls.

Since you spend so much of your time as an editor and so much of School Library Journal's page budget in reporting on ALA's Children's Services Division (CSD) and its Young Adult Services Division (YASD), how is it you've come so far in forecasting without mentioning the roles of either one in the future of public library's services to children and young adults?

Because neither CSD nor YASD has demonstrated any capacity for forward planning of the sort that shapes or alters the circumstances that control their public library specialties. These are reactive divisions. Both fail to encourage their members to active membership in the Public Library Association, a serious mistake. YASD's greatest achievement in the last ten years has been informational for its membership, gradually shifting emphasis from materials selection to programming for young adults. CSD is mired in selection—chiefly book selection—and there is no letup in sight to the number of new awards CSD can dream up. Both divisions, in their conference programs, give over much planning and time to the luncheons and dinners featuring prize-winning juvenile authors or authors popular with young adults—which is all very pleasant, but doesn't do a damn thing toward the extension or expansion of their knowledge of the age groups they serve, nor does it marshal their resources to impact on: setting the educational requirements of their specialties, arguing for priority status for the funding of their specialties; or identifying areas of necessary research in their specialties. Both divisions have had very little influence on ALA's Council in the adoption of policy statements. (Individual children's and YA librarians have had some influence there, but most often acting as individuals rather than as fully supported or directed representatives of CSD or YASD.)

Since both CSD and YASD are and always have been dominated by women, does the current wheel-spinning indicate some flitter-wittedness and lack of political talent special to women?

No. The women entering library service now, these specialties in particular, are much better prepared to challenge the status quo, much more acute politically, much more likely to be vocally self-insistent from the start of their memberships in ALA, and far less inclined to bow to seniority when it is perceived as ineffectual. They will continue to predominate over men in these specialties for the next 25 years, but they will reshape and reform these divisions. This is more clearly evident now as a goal in YASD than in CSD, but it will take right up to 2000 for either division to accomplish.

Does this mean that you think that the library schools are doing a better job in education for these specialties and will continue to do so?

Not at all. Quite the reverse, in fact. I think that the women entering these specialities are responding to social forces and conditions outside of the library schools. Both the men and the women in library schools who expect to enter public library services to children and young adults are getting a raw deal whenever their course work does not include sections of study in the psychology of the age groups they expect to serve, sections of study in educational methods and philosophies, and a stretch of supervised internship before graduation. Most of our accredited library schools are so far away from these requirements for minimal introduction to skills and information that are actually learned faster on the job anyway that only the revolt of the employer group could possibly force reform. As I pointed out earlier, I don't foresee either the major urban libraries that have the greatest legislative clout within the states rising up to demand anything better for children and young adults, nor do I see any evidence that CSD or YASD is paying any effective attention to the matter of education for these specialties beyond emitting annual bird calls to the deans of library schools to shape up and do more and better materials selection courses for these specialists.

What about the future of materials selection in public libraries' services to children and young adults?

It will continue to absorb the attention of all units offering direct services to minors. Based on the direction of current collection expansion in county public library systems, I think we will see equal attention to critical choices among materials in all formats rather than the near-total attention now given to books. Given the obvious ambivalence about and reluctance in legal circles to pronounce that all Constitutional rights fully extend to minors, I don't think that librarians are going to be free of restraints on selection that involve "suitability" and "good taste" factors in collections for the young. And, by 2000 and beyond, these selection factors will still be sensed rather than defined. There is no significant support, within or without library service, for intellectual freedom for children, but some pressure toward revising its extension to young adults. All signs at present indicate that those below the age of 16 are unlikely to be granted, by the public library or their specialized librarians, the full exercise of unrestricted, unguided choice in library materials.

Can you think of any existing, potentially influential group in public library services that you haven't attempted to outrage in these critiques so scantily clad as forecasts of the probable results of past and present conditions in public library services for children and young adults?

Yes. I haven't laid a glove on the gentlemen of the library periodical press. I think that LJ's given scant attention to these public library services specialties since SLJ was split out of LJ's combined issues last January. I think that American Libraries is giving only indulgent or cosmetic notice to these service areas. I think the Wilson Library Bulletin can't do it all in one guest-edited issue devoted to some aspect of children's literature or services every October. I realize all too well the extent to which editors of specialist publications can share the biases, prejudices, and blind spots of the specialties they seek to serve as I'm sure they do, too. They're the commentators who can focus and start a great debate among the public library administrators and trustees who will make the governing decisions on the future of public library services to children and young adults, no matter what their specialist librarians in these areas want or recommend. I think they're all roosting on a public scandal in major urban public library services to minors. There's more than bankruptcy in funding involved. And, there are more good stories in smaller city and county public library services than get published. Speak up, Gents.

by Dan Lacy

SOME 20 YEARS AGO, I was bold enough to present a Bowker lecture with the title Books and the Future: a Speculation, in which I hazarded a guess as to what might happen to books in the 20 years or so ahead. It is a somewhat odd feeling to reread that address now that its predicted time has come—a bit like a writer of science fiction surviving to ride in the space vehicles he had imagined in decades past.

That address was given in a time of pessimism about books. In the mid-1950s television and the digital computer were fascinating devices, still new enough to excite unbounded dreams of their future use. The world was on tiptoe to enter an exciting new era of communication, and books seemed a drab and outmoded survival of the past. No one thought books would disappear; but there were those who thought the reading of books, like the riding of horses, would become the elegant recreation of a small and chicly old-fashioned elite, remote from the practical concerns and the mass amusements of everyday life, and that the bookstore would follow in the path of the blacksmith shop.

The Fifties forecast

I did not share this pessimism. It seemed to me that the possible role of the computer as a storer and distributor of textual information was vastly exaggerated and that television was likely to stimulate more reading than it replaced. And there were three powerful trends that seemed almost certain to produce a greatly increased demand for books.

One was the dramatically increased birth rate of the post-war years, which was already producing a radical increase in primary-grade enrollment—an increase that would move upward in the school system year-by-year, a grade at a time, like some enormous glacier, creating as it moved, a vast increase in the demand for textbooks and related materials.

BOOKS and the FUTURE revisited

". . . the rapid growth of the potential private book market . . . will press publishers to attend once more to long neglected modes of sale to the general public . . ."

A second was the new set of expectations with respect to post-high school education created by the G. I. Bill of Rights. For the first time, going on to college had become a normal rather than a rare expectation for high school graduates. This alone has already greatly increased college enrollment, and it was obvious that when the children of the post-war baby boom reached college age and converged with new proportions of college attendance, enrollments would truly soar.

The third was the heightened level and swift development of technology in our society. This would inevitably multiply the demands for professional and technical education, and for constant subsequent retraining, producing in turn a need for an enormous output of textbooks and professional books.

Moreover, though less certainly, one could expect that by the end of the 1960s, when the children of the early post-war years would be leaving college, we would have a very rapid increase in the number of young, well-educated adults founding new families and giving the book market an added surge as educational growth began to level off.

Through the Sixties

By and large these predictions came true and indeed were exceeded. The computer found enormous uses hardly dreamed of 20 years ago, but they were not uses that replaced books. Indeed they tended to be uses that aided the publishing of books, both through subduing and organizing for publication otherwise intractable masses of data and through providing new alternatives to conventional typesetting. Television consumed far more of the national attention than I had guessed. For almost every age group, social stratum, and geographic area of the population, watching television became by far the largest single use of leisure time. Yet for most Americans this was a stimulating experience bringing, especially through news programs, a fresh and first-hand view of the world, its leaders and problems. I am confident that this was one factor in the greatly increased sale and readership of nonfiction books.

I had guessed that the sales of books might quadruple in the 20 years to come. In fact the increase, measured in dollars, was nearer seven-fold, from about $500,000,000 to about $3,500,000,000. When this startling figure is discounted for inflation, however, the original prediction was not far off the fact.

The next 20 years

However, it is hard to see in the ten or 20 years ahead any patterns as clear as those that could be foreseen in the mid-1950s. The birth rate, which rose to its peak in 1969, when more than 4,250,000 were born, has declined precipitously since, to a low of little more than 3,000,000 in 1973. Though the birth rate itself continues to fall, indeed to a level below that necessary for zero population growth, the actual number of births annually has begun to turn up slightly as the number of women of child-bearing age increases. There is also some evidence that the extremely sharp drop in the number of children born represents a decision to postpone childbearing rather than to avoid it altogether. Though we are unlikely soon to return to a level of more than 4,000,000 births a year, we may well be over 3,500,000 by 1980 or the years immediately following.

What all this means is that elementary school enrollment is falling. Teachers are returning each fall to smaller classes and to more and more empty classrooms. This is an experience we have known only once before in our history—in the late 1930s and the early to mid-1940s, when the result of the depression was felt. Even then the drop was not nearly so precipitate.

This decline in enrollments will begin to hit the high schools in another year or two, and by the early 1980s the number of youths of college age will begin to wane. The actual number of college students will be greatly affected, however, by patterns of college attendance, and college enrollments may stay level or even grow in the 1980s, in spite of the decline in the number of persons in their late teens and early twenties. In any event, elementary enrollments should be moving up again in the early to mid-1980s, and high school enrollments in the latter part of the decade, which should more than balance any possible decline at the high school level.

The most dynamic factor in the startling increase in book sales between 1950 and 1970 was the demand for textbooks, supplementary readings, and library books to meet the educational needs of the explosively growing number of students at all levels. What will happen to publishing in the 20 years ahead when the total for all enrollments—whatever the shifts in particular age groups or geographic areas—will remain essentially flat?

That depends on what society decides it wants from education and what it is willing to pay to get it. There is a profound dissatisfaction with our schools. For all our investment in education in the 1950s and 1960s, tests indicate that students graduate from high school with less mastery of basic learning than a generation ago. Education appears to have failed as an instrument to eliminate poverty, or to achieve racial and social integration. Reading retardation and functional illiteracy remain as vast and stubborn problems. Hundreds of thousands of youths reach adulthood annually having spent most of their lives in school without having acquired any marketable skill by which they can earn a living.

One possible reaction to the profound dissatisfaction with the results of our educational efforts is to diminish our support of elementary and high schools—a reaction made the more appealing by the serious financial problems faced by states and local governments. Another possible reaction is to take advantage of the lull in expansion, of the surcease in the constant demand for new buildings and more teachers. We have an opportunity now to invest substantially larger funds per child, to make classes smaller, to attempt more individualized instruction, to supply more adequate educational materials, to give more library support to education. We could determine to make education work, by a devoted, professional, adequately funded effort.

In higher education the social need for a major effort will not diminish. Indeed it will increase. The trend toward a more highly complex and technological society is probably irreversible. And the demands on that technology are certain to increase enormously. Even if the very sharp reduction in our birth rate continues, we shall have to provide for 30,000,000 more Americans before the century's end. And we shall have to deal with the squalor in which millions of present Americans live. An enormous increase in output must be achieved, even to preserve our standard of living at what most of us have today.

This vast increase in output must be achieved at a time when the cost of energy is moving swiftly upward and when even our present level of output is threatening the livability of the air and water about us. Rapid economic growth is essential if the world as a whole is to avoid famine and despair; to achieve it in the face of dwindling fuel supplies and desperate needs to reduce pollution will require revolutionary advances in our technology.

We need to train far larger numbers in the sciences and advanced technology and in the arts of governing enterprises, public and private. This will require not only larger and better supported institutions of higher education, it will require the opportunity for continuing education for professionals, and perhaps most of all it will require a renewed dedication to basic scientific research, including university and research libraries.

". . . about 4,000,000 men and women will become adults each year"

All of this suggests that the need for materials for education, for advanced study, for continuing professional education, and for research will not be reduced by the lowering of the birth rate. On the contrary, the need—though it may change somewhat in character—can only grow in intensity.

New adults

One other major factor that will produce an upward thrust in the demand for books is the rapid growth in the relatively young, highly educated, adult population that will take place over the next two decades. For the first 20 years or so after World War II the explosive growth in population that we witnessed consisted entirely of children and youths. The adult population was relatively stable. The number of adults in their late 20's and 30's was actually declining. Now, for the 20 years to come, about 4,000,000 men and women will become adults each year. About half of them will have had some college education. A high proportion will be college graduates.

Many will have had advanced post-graduate or professional training. The number of persons in their 20's and 30's will be increasing at about 1,500,000 a year. Twenty years from now there should be nearly 80,000,000 Americans in their 20's and 30's, with 40,000,000 having a college education. There have never been such numbers of young, educated, relatively affluent people in any nation in the world before. They will constitute a market for general trade books, for gardening books and cook books, for books on sports and hobbies, for serious discussions of public affairs such as has never been seen before.

Electronic reinforcement

All of this is to say that today, as 20 years ago, the decades ahead offer the potential of a major, rapid growth in the demand for educational and research materials and for recreational and inspirational resources as well. And, as was the case then, the question rises whether this demand will be satisfied by books or by new devices of electronic technology. Now that we have lived with electronic miracles for a generation I think we can answer that question with more assurance than we could 20 years ago. Neither television nor the computer is any longer a mystery of unforeseeable powers; and we can say with confidence that they will reinforce, not replace, books. They can do many things that books cannot, but they do not threaten the role of the book in its own domain. If the needs we perceive are met, they will be met by books—perhaps books whose physical form reflects new printing and reprographic technologies, but books nonetheless.

Twenty years ago we were compelled to say that the rich potential one could foresee for books remained uncertain. Whether in fact it would be realized depended on two things. One was whether publishers could meet society's needs with new modes of production and distribution, as they had in the 1920s and 30s with book clubs, and in the 1940s with the mass-market paperback. The other was whether as a society we chose a future in which intellect was valued, education was widely shared, and the human spirit could develop in freedom. During the 1950s and 60s we did commit ourselves to a society in which as never before the boons of education would be open to all, across lines of race and economic class. We did commit ourselves as never before to the proposition that all men are created equal, and we tried to use books and education as means of achieving that equality. We held a faith that research could unlock answers to all our major problems, and we committed billions to the development of research institutions.

Socially created markets

Book publishing was successful during those decades as an avenue for the production of the kinds of books the times demanded: new educational materials; children's books addressed to children who were not white or middle-class or from small towns; books used in or embodying the results of the greatly expanded research effort. But the industry did little or nothing to solve problems of distribution, save to develop the trade paperback and place paperbacks in bookstores. Instead, it relied on governments, through the school, the college, and the library, to create the market for books, and only those socially created markets fueled the growth of publishing during the 50s and 60s.

We face the same dual question today. Will we as a nation renew our commitment to the sort of society whose educational and cultural life is enriched by books? And will the book industry respond with editorial creativity and with innovative production and distribution?

In the 70s our social commitments have shriveled. Measured in constant dollars, federal contributions to education, to libraries, and to research have been reduced. Fiscally beleaguered states and localities and static endowment funds have not been able to close the gap. Both the Nixon and the Ford administrations have pressed for even sharper cuts. Contraction has replaced expansion as the public policy in the support of education, libraries, and research. The withering effect of such a policy has already been felt in the areas most sensitive to library purchases—children's books on the one hand, and university press books and other advanced scientific and scholarly books on the other.

The future of books over the next 20 years will depend very largely upon whether we, as a society, recover our faith in education, in research, and in our capacity to use knowledge to achieve a more abundant, humane, and egalitarian life.

Can publishing respond?

But it will depend too on the innovative boldness and professional competence of publishers. A new panoply of technical resources for book production is open to us by the computer, by photographic processes, including microphotography, and by new printing and xerographic techniques. In particular these developments open possibilities for the more economical publication of works in very limited demand, even to the extent of "on-demand" publishing, in which copies are produced only to order. How effectively will we use these devices to lower the relative cost of books and to increase the range of those that can be published?

The flattening of the educational and library market on the one hand and the rapid growth of the potential private book market on the other will press publishers to attend once more to long neglected modes of sale to the general public. The need to strengthen bookstore and wholesaling channels, to use television more effectively for advertising as well as for promotion, will challenge the best efforts of publishers.

The future of books is not immutably fixed by either demography or technology. It remains in our hands to determine, both as a people and as a profession. I concluded that Bowker lecture 20 years ago by saying ". . . perhaps those prophets do see truly in whose visions of the future the defeat or the victory of human values goes hand in hand with the extinction or the flowering of books." The prose may have been a bit ornate, but I think the statement is as valid now as it was then. The future of books is still linked with the future of human values.

For over 100 years we've been concerned about librarians and their needs.

Guess who-o-o-o?

Our very first full-page ad in Library Journal appeared one hundred years ago. In the very first issue.

And ten years before that, our publishing house was co-founded by Frederick H. Leypoldt, who also started Library Journal.

So, it's with a special feeling of kinship that we wish Library Journal another 100 years of achievement and success.

Guessed who? It's the company with the owl symbol...

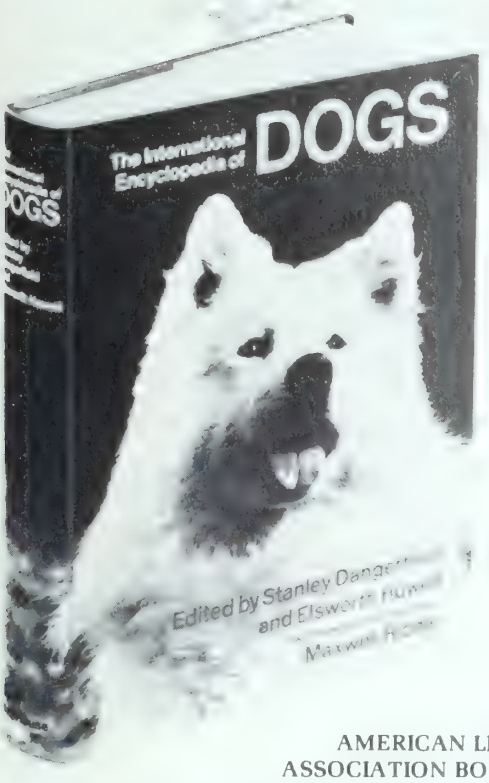
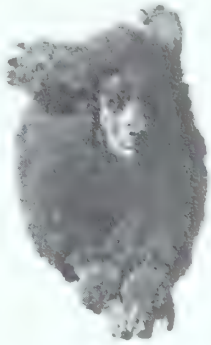
The World's Favorite Books on DOGS





HOWELL DOG BOOKS OF DISTINCTION

OVER 40 MILLION dogs live in America today. Howell books—hailed for content and quality by the Dog Writers Association of America and critics worldwide—are published especially for their owners.

In Howell books, dog lovers have 81 ready sources of solid, reliable, in-depth information on every facet of dogs and dog keeping. And, while learning about their dogs and his needs, they can enjoy hundreds of beautiful photographs and instructive illustrations.

Each Howell book has as its author a widely acknowledged, experienced authority. 45 books in the award-winning line are durably hardbound individual volumes on America's most popular breeds—like the romantic NEWFOUNDLAND, the exotic AFGHAN HOUND, the rollicking IRISH SETTER.

Each title in the "Complete" breed series explores the breed's origins, development, care, grooming, its performance in show and obedience competition, breeding, the official American Kennel Club standard of excellence—and much more.

33 Howell books are fascinating, functional "how-to" works on subjects pertaining to all breeds—training, proper feeding and nutrition, psychological behavior, breeding, obedience competition, dog showing and judging, care, anatomy and conformation—and more.

For the reference shelf we recommend two magnificent books: THE COMPLETE DOG BOOK, the new 672-page 15th Edition of the American Kennel Club's Official Publication, and the comprehensive INTERNATIONAL ENCYCLOPEDIA OF DOGS, an 8½ x 11, 480-page work with information in alphabetical order on all aspects of dogs, and over 125 photographs in full color.

IF YOU ARE SURFEITED with apocalyptic visions, so am I. I find it very difficult to predict the future, partly because the rate of change today makes such predictions instantly obsolete and partly because I tend to reject both visions of doom and utopia. So I find myself about to draw conclusions, make recommendations, and predict the future of media in libraries trying to resist dire prophesies, with doubts and a hope that resolution of the problems ahead lies within our reach.

I have long had ambiguous attitudes towards media. For a time I interpreted "understanding media" to mean a wholesale endorsement of media technologies, some sort of mindless enthusiasm for kinetic images and groovy sounds. My only brush with media theory in college was a cursory reading of Marshall McLuhan's Understanding Media which, like many before and after me, I violently rejected, thinking he was attacking print. Years later my perceptions of what McLuhan was expressing have been radically altered, but not without the struggle to understand a startling and revolutionary concept.

My attitudes towards media were first tested when I found myself an AV Coordinator in a private high school, knowing little about libraries and even less about media. From sheer survival instincts I set out to learn something about what these "audiovisual services" were that I was supposed to provide. Like many media librarians, I was "lugging and plugging" equipment, building a media collection from the rather mediocre educational offerings available, teaching about mass media to senior English students and thinking about what treatment media deserved in libraries and how our media environment affects us. Media study, once you've become aware of it, has a way of hounding you into everlasting consciousness.

Over the course of the last few years I've found that attitudes toward media among my librarian friends ran the gamut from mystical devotion to atheistic scepticism. Media enthusiasts seem to fall into two categories: on the one hand, the intuitive, nonverbal people who do not articulate in the traditional media of print and the spoken word. They sometimes hamper their effectiveness at conveying the impact media have for libraries. On the other hand, there are the media theorists with a profound sense of the social, psychological, and political impact of media but who are so scholarly in their expression that those most in need of instruction are turned off by erudite tone and language. Both proponents attempt to counteract a lack of knowledge and negativism felt about media: one reveals the media to be worthy of serious reflection and scholarly study, the other demonstrates how other modes of expression and awareness are available through auditory and visual means. Neither one has yet succeeded in convincing the doubting Thomases among us that media are vital to the library's future.

Obviously the basic issue here is that media, that ambiguous, even elusive, term hasn't yet been defined in such a way that it brings that shiver of professional commitment which "the Word" invokes.

The "word" is a medium

From time immemorial the Word—capable of symbolically representing the reality of God—has held a sacred meaning. How do you go about convincing people whose dedication to knowledge and information can be equated with a holy reverence for words (books, newspapers, magazines, the printed medium) that media are worthy of such a commitment? Continued resistance to a concept of media, which of course encompasses the word not as primary code but as one of several communications' languages, indicates the enormity of this task. The problem is not so much a matter of informing librarians, as it is of converting them to a new religion in which one god is now revealed as having several persons.

The library profession has no one ideological stance on media. Attitudes toward media vary from one branch of librarianship to another as from one librarian to another. At the risk of losing all anti-McLuhanites, what seems needed is for the profession to arrive at an understanding of media as McLuhan saw them, as codes of communication. When media as a concept is limited to audiovisual aids or nonprint, when media mean filmstrips, transparencies, and simulation games, few are likely to deem such codes equal partners of the powerful and sophisticated language of words. But, when media are viewed as those sources of information which dominate us, print, television, film, radio, telephone, among others, a total concept of a new information environment created only in the last hundred years becomes apparent. The definition of the goals of librarianship, "to provide user-oriented service and information to all" expressed by ALA President Allie Beth Martin, requires a new understanding of media as the information environment in which users live. Understanding media becomes then a basic task for librarians who will provide for Mediaman's information needs.

The industrialized mind

Hans Magnus Enzensberger, writing in Partisan Review, identified this fearsome reality imposed by media: "Hardly anyone seems to be aware of the phenomenon as a whole: the industrialization of the human mind . . . The mind industry's main business and concern is not to sell its product: it is to 'sell' the existing order, to perpetuate the prevailing pattern of man's domination by man, no matter who runs the society and by what means. Its main task is to expand and train our consciousness—in order to exploit it."

Man has become mass man as a direct result of the mass technologies altering life styles, work patterns, information structures. There is always that fear that all this "progress" may lead to a mass mind programmed to think certain thoughts and act in specified ways. Libraries like to envision themselves as trustees of information, guarantors of intellectual freedom. But today, the information upon which freedom depends is not just preservable in books. Denied access to media information and the techniques necessary to decipher their full meaning, we fall prey to what Jacques Ellul calls the most dangerous form of determinism, the technological phenomenon, or as Enzensberger puts it, the industrialization of the mind. One need only look at television, a most familiar technological phenomena, to realize that for most people in this country, television provides their principal source of education, entertainment, information, and opinion. The solution to the problem technology poses is not to abolish them (which is impossible) nor to ignore them (worse yet) but to become aware of how any medium—print as well as electronic communications media—affects us, informs us. It is only by becoming aware of the dangers of these technologies that we can hope to transcend them.

But, in an endeavor to recognize the potential harms of media, we must not overlook the fact that the symbolic and value communication of our culture is now being carried out largely within these media. While media technologies may serve as agents of mind control, they also extend our ways of knowing, increase our knowledge, and expand our consciousness.

To provide user-oriented service and information in our mass media environment, librarians will need to think about how people learn, why people turn to the mass media and why people read, how electronic media communicate differently from print. Help in answering questions like these comes not only from thoughtful librarians researching these areas, but also from the social sciences of psychology and sociology, from philosophy and communications theory.

A state of resonance

Tony Schwartz in The Responsive Chord explores how electronic communication differs from the traditional concept of information transportation. The transportation theory involves a sender, a message, and a receiver. The sender, or author/publisher, transmits the message, or book, to the receiver, librarian/patron. In this equation, all communications' information is contained in the message. A transportation theory of communication is useful only when the movement of information is a central problem. But, when someone is overloaded with information, as we are of late, the transportation theory ceases to be meaningful. What we are really dealing with is information flow, a much more complex process than the mere transportation of messages.

With electronically mediated human communication, the communicator's function is to achieve a "state of resonance" with the person receiving visual and auditory stimuli from media. Listeners or viewers bring far more information to the communication event than any communicator can put into a program, commercial, or message. The problem becomes one of understanding the kinds of information and experiences stored in the audience, the patterning of this information, and the "interactive resonance" process by which stimuli evoke this stored information. "In communicating at electronic speed," Schwartz tells us, "we no longer direct information into an audience, but try to evoke stored information out of them, in a patterned way."

Schwartz' analysis not only throws light on how the electronic media of television and radio can manipulate our minds to "sell" their message, but it also has implications for how librarians must approach information seekers in our media environment.

In assessing the information needs of a user, the librarian as communicator must take into account the information and experience already stored in the user's brain to provide the right stimuli—be it book, film, or leading questions, which will evoke the meaning sought. A more involving process is called for. The library user, no matter how "culturally deprived," comes with a vast array of information and experiences already stored in his brain. Meeting information needs may no longer just mean locating books or films, "directing information into an audience." It will probably mean a more active service, discovering what the user knows, what he or she needs to know, and how this information can best be revealed. Lengthy interviews, placing telephone calls, exploring several media resources will be part of this process.

Fear of technology

Once media are recognized for their penetrating, far-reaching effect upon the information environment of the library user, once the profession understands the importance of a total concept of media as vital to user-oriented library collections and services, then related issues raised by media technologies can be dealt with one by one. Among the most pressing is the gut-level issue—fear of technology. There are several reasons for such fear. One is the myth that women (and librarianship remains largely a woman's profession) are not mechanically inclined or capable of handling heavy, complicated equipment. This is a "myth" because the female sex is not so biologically limited. Intimidation by machinery comes from a lack of confidence governed by cultural conditioning. While the women's movement has helped in shooting down such myths, there are still many who believe that they simply can not handle equipment, who remain traumatized by technology.

Fear of media technology is often accompanied by the fear of exposing oneself as lacking in knowledge. Toffler cautioned us in Future Shock that "new knowledge compels those for whom it is relevant . . . to reorganize their store of images. It forces them to relearn today what they thought they knew yesterday." Confronting a lack of knowledge and expertise, especially in an alien world of machinery, is particularly difficult for people with a high stake in their self-image as "competent professionals."

I have great sympathy for people plagued by such fears. Faced with five different brands of 16mm projector and indecipherable instruction manuals, caught in classrooms and auditoriums when bulbs blew and the natives grew restless, I know the anger and frustration media technologies prompt. My first video experience was so devastating to my self-confidence—after having misthreaded the tape and ruining a 20-minute documentary—that I was ready to give up on media then and there. Fortunately I did not. Challenge and conflict are the stuff upon which self-confidence is built. Overcoming such fears will not only offer librarians cause for self-congratulation but, in the grander scale of things, insure increased access to all information codes.

The time has come for all librarians to face the realities technology presents to them. "The functions and services of all professions are determined by the technologies at their disposal. Librarianship is no exception. If the profession fails to understand and appropriately utilize the communications technologies which are available it has failed in its social function," comments library educator Estelle Jussim.

Communications technology is not going to disappear nor slow down long enough for people still operating in a linear mode to grab hold of its tail. "A lot of people are waiting for the technological cycle to stop. You have to stick your finger in that spinning wheel sometime," is good advice from Bruce Fairley of the Metro Toronto Central Library. The point is that technology goes on reinventing itself. Many are now waiting for the advent of the videodisc to resolve their video format dilemmas. Some are holding off on any video activity until a standardized format is proclaimed. I can't help but imagine that, based on the rate of change and number of discoveries we've seen appear in recent years, some new invention will appear on the horizon—perhaps holographic video—which will postpone decision for the cautious once again.

The videodisc, forseen in the next two years, will make acquisition of preprogrammed video as easy as collecting phonodiscs, but it will not replace portapak or studio video which fulfills another function, helping users create their own information. What may happen is that the videodisc will displace portapak video by discouraging its growth, a sorry fate for the community-centered, user-oriented library. An awareness of the different capabilities media technologies offer us is needed so that we don't, in our ignorance, trade-off information we make locally for mere ease of retrieval we can buy.

Last hired . . .

Another issue, crucial now because of its potential to seriously set back media programs and media consciousness is the crisis of funding. So long as there are librarians who still view media as aids peripheral to the main functions of the library, the first items to be cut will be media services and staff. Shout it from the highest library rooftops, this is a major mistake.

No one likes to finger the guy who's got to go, but why does it always seem to be the media person? Huge investments are squandered as media systems are relegated to closets because the only person who knew how to operate them is crossed off the budget. Enormous potential for community and school participation is being denied or frustrated by such cuts. This stems from another version of that hierarchical notion that words are more valuable than images and sounds, books si, media no.

And when it comes to dollar value, who is to say that books are cheaper than audiovisual media? The library profession doesn't subscribe to any theory of supplying only "bargain-basement information." Quality and comprehension are at stake here. A single half-hour film may fulfill a need that 50 books on the subject are inadequate to fill. For example, to provide a youngster born in the last ten years with information about John Kennedy's assassination, newspaper, magazine and book accounts, useful in themselves, do not equal the invaluable information that the actual Super-8mm footage of the tragedy offers or the complex feelings expressed through the collage of television and radio coverage in Bruce Conner's film, Report.

Media consciousness is free

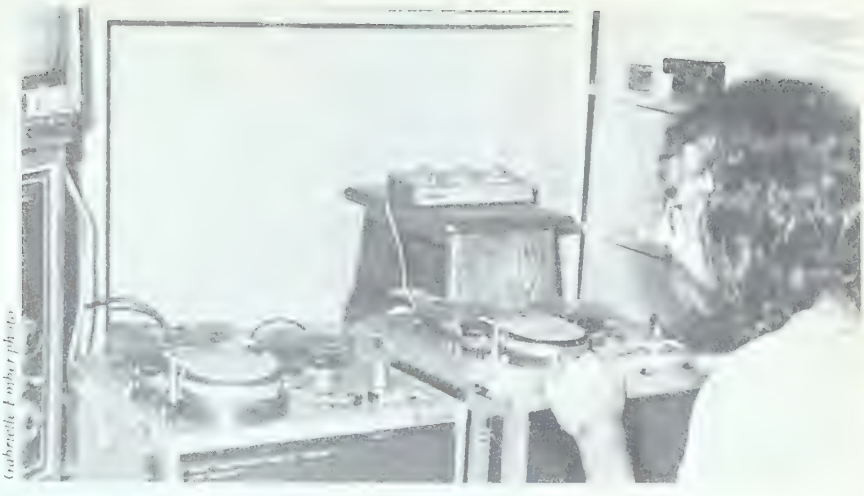
While cut backs are inevitable, cut outs are more than foolish, they're dangerous. Different media formats can not be viewed as unrelated, dispensable entities. A library wiping out its video program is about as sensible as their cancelling all magazine subscriptions or ceasing to collect fiction. Ignoring important information sources merely because they are inconvenient to store endangers our basic freedom of access to information.

Strategies are at our disposal for dealing with the harsh realities limited funding implies for media services. Increased cooperation of public and school libraries, of local libraries with their regional groupings, consortia of libraries, universities, museums, and community information centers, will help hold down costs through the sharing of expenses, resources, and staff. Time and effort will be needed to work out such cooperative efforts but, if deemed a priority, the initial expenditures of time in planning will be rewarded by continued and increased access to media information. And interlibrary loan systems will figure as a major factor in the containment of materials expenses.

Remedies such as those outlined here are no doubt being expanded upon by writers exploring other issues in this magazine because cooperation is going to be the key to all strategies defending libraries against the onslaught of rising costs versus shrinking finances.

In the meantime, libraries faced with severe financial limitations need not abandon media commitment because of no cash. While sophisticated video systems bear high price tags, media consciousness is free for the asking. James Brown in his soon-to-be-published study New Media in Public Libraries comments on many innovative media activities he examined, "I don't think that it was money that did it always, it was the determination on the parts of people with ideas about what a library could be and ought to be—the vision of involved librarians."

Libraries must not overlook the fact that they have access to numerous media technologies capable of extending their abilities to locate and deliver information to their users. George Stoney, Director of New York University's Alternate Media Center, reminds us that books are media too and that collecting books on media is a beginning for media service. Film, audio, and video are media "superstars," but low-profile media such as the telephone, photocopier, and typewriter offer libraries an untapped potential for revolutionizing information services. For example, the telephone, as Ted Carpenter tells us, turns men into "angels," capable of being in more than one place at the same time. Creative use of the telephone turns static information into kinetic information. Calling up the Department of Social Services or the local



NOW chapter, the librarian gets up-to-the minute information, which as we know only too well changes radically from day to day. Book information is dated before it even comes out. Newspapers and magazines, though more current, do not give one the opportunity to dialogue, to ask an authority a question followed by a further question in seeking out answers to a dilemma. People-to-people information service via the telephone is a positive, readily available media service which all libraries could implement.

Reorienting libraries to the belief that media service begins with an attitude of mind, that inexpensive media technologies are available in every library, that media are not just for the richly endowed, may be a significant step towards actualizing a new concept of library information service.

What is needed now is the profession's understanding of our media environment and commitment to a total media concept for libraries; a freedom from the fear media technologies evoke; and cooperative efforts on the parts of all branches of librarianship in coordinating activities to provide for the needs of future library users.

Freedom includes all media

Filling user needs through media technologies will present numerous difficulties which librarians will have to resolve. Some librarians are worried that media technologies place them in more controversial positions than books ever did. But book service is a public act too, which puts the library and librarian on the line each time users are provided with materials. People hesitating to engage in media activity for such reasons had best examine their attitudes about books and freedom of access.

Free access to media information is often not the policy of libraries which, while they would hesitate about violating the library bill of rights with regard to print, do not give a second thought to the propriety of limiting media access to individuals, groups, or minors. Don Robert's current study on media censorship, sponsored in part by the Council on Library Resources will lay the groundwork for further investigation and action in this area.

Standards for cataloging "non-print" media are being revised by library and media education groups. The revised Anglo-American Cataloging Rules, scheduled to appear in 1977, may help resolve some questions. But, before then, guidelines need to be followed and unified media collections need to be established so that users will not be frustrated in their attempts at locating information. Somehow, someone will finally meet the crying need for a mediagraphic tool which will assemble all data on media so that acquisitions librarians and library users can see what materials are available and where to find them.

Media credibility

There are many other problems raised by media which are too numerous to mention here. While a philosophical, psychological, and financial disposition to a total concept of media for libraries may help librarians in resolving their media dilemmas, we wait for this great moment. Sound judgments and implementation of media programs are called for now.

Will libraries survive without a total media concept? Probably, but libraries will not be able to meet the information needs of users without taking seriously the implications of our media environment, without recognizing the awesome influence of mass media. The library can not expect to remain vital if it maintains that the portable book is the only carrier of information and communication which it is mandated to provide. And so long as controversies over the validity of auditory and visual literacy persist, chauvinistically discriminating against other codes and other learning styles, the library will lose its credibility as an institution preserving and making accessible all human knowledge.

I am not sure how ready librarians are for that "religious conversion" that adoption of a total media concept seems to imply. It is within the power of the profession, as within each individual, to reinvent the future. If we recognize the importance of a total media concept for libraries we are at least on our way to finding out what the future may bring. If not, we may look forward to this vision, portrayed by Jorge Luis Borges in "The Library of Babel":

> The human species—the unique species—is about to be extinguished, but the library will endure: illuminated, solitary, infinite, perfectly motionless, equipped with precious volumes, useless, incorruptible, secret.

A look at the future information arena

MOST WELL INFORMED CITIZENS are now both afraid of and bored by the future. The reasons are simple: the problems are so awesome and unprecedented that we face changes bewildering enough to tax man's adaptive capability; and the prophets who are guiding us through the enormous compost pile of futurology seem endless, mindless, and growing in number.

In less than a decade we have abandoned our view of a certain future—with endless rainbows and a pot of gold for all—for one which, at best, holds limited promise and few prizes. The layman (and that's most of us) has not yet come to terms with this prospect, although the surface ferment is visible.

The information field is an arena of human enterprise which is both the end and the means. The information field (i.e., information and its ancillary supporting mechanisms particularly those associated with communications and computer technology) is a major cause of our existing problems and one of the principal mechanisms for providing constructive solutions in the future.

Blinkered, not blinded: the imperatives

If the past decade has developed any general intellectual symbol, it is the recognition of the implications of finitude. Human life is circumscribed and constrained to an unprecedented degree. The doctrine of progress, the ideal of the frontier, and the assumption of resource inexhaustibility were key pillars of a secular, rational faith in continuous material progress. This set of beliefs reinforced our confidence in a future of plenty. We believed we had the resources to replace, outmode, and regenerate indefinitely and that the exponential curve of scientific development would guarantee the evolution of new concepts and processes. The assumption behind such bromides as "90 percent of all the scientists who ever lived are alive and working at this moment" was that such work would have continued with successful results, which would be translated into social reality with considerable speed. As the concept of "future shock" was to indicate, this faith was misplaced because continuous change was not an unalloyed blessing.

We now accept a different frame for our picture of the world: spaceship earth is a system both closed and finite in its resources. On the most fundamental level, we cannot as yet judge whether this emerging viewpoint is any more correct than the one it replaces. But we can be sure that the recognition of the implications of finitude will condition responses to the future for some time to come, which is why we must take this concept as a starting point. This notion of a finite world is so pervasive and all-encompassing that we can only conclude that the possibilities of future development will be limited by our ability to relate such development to our understanding of the current human condition.

The first class of limits are technical limits. Western society has been conditioned to believe that scientific innovation, through its handmaiden, applied technology, could overcome any societal problem. Our present pattern of industrial and social development has been centered on the notion of pushing back technological limits until they reach theoretical boundaries. In recent times it has become clear that we have reached the point of diminishing returns with this approach. There are many reasons. For example: The approach has not solved many important societal problems and may have created most of them In some research areas we may be pushing the fundamental theoretical limits of the disciplines involved. A significant backlog has developed between the findings of pure research and their translation into safe and useful products. The limits of western man's ability to consume may have been reached.

But there is another, more fundamental problem which brings us to the second class of limits we face: economic limits. Given that there is a finite amount of money and an infinity of demands, priorities have become necessary. Since social demands are rising throughout the world and governmental philosophies have been altered to accommodate a greater degree of intervention in the wealth distribution process, there is less money available for any one area, particularly scientific and technical research. Production efficiencies may make a new technology economically feasible at some later date, but the increasing sophistication (and thus costs) of basic scientific research works against it. Stripped of its former glamour, scientific research can only be viewed by politicians as a risky enterprise. It requires an enormous capital and operating investment in time, people, equipment, facilities, and money with no guarantee of success. This drying up of government financial support for big science, coupled with inflation, represents a diminution of research effort. This insures two things: first, even if there is anything out there to discover, it becomes less likely that the manpower will be mobilized to do it; and second, since the continued development and redistribution of the present structure cannot be supported, scrapped, or changed overnight, piecemeal development and sub-optimal performance become inevitable.

The third class of limits are ecological. The ecological movement, has demonstrated beyond doubt, the necessity for a unified approach to the implementation of major technologies. This means that technical development must be allied to an appreciation of the effects of a given activity. As a result, certain types of existing operations (e.g. automobile factories) may become environmentally unacceptable. If they cannot be scrapped, additional capital cost will be needed even though the financial return from the added investment may remain the same or drop. Ecological limitations also embrace the resource shortage problem. Many of the key elements of our high-technology culture are sufficiently limited to make trade-off analysis limitation of available food and energy. The energy limitation is exacerbated by the fact that high-technology cultures are intensive energy users, which can only be limited marginally by efficient conservation practices.

The fourth limitation is social. The current social order of the world includes political and economic vested interests which require change and cannot be expected to succumb quietly. Current examples range from the demands of the third world to the disruptions caused by trade unions because of the introduction of new technologies in trades. Each has led to disruptions in job and lifestyle patterns and caused serious labor and economic problems. To some the very fabric of democratic government is being threatened because decision-making processes are failing. Democratic government is predicated upon leisurely decision-making processes which allow the interplay of conflicting interests to be resolved. Technological crises which often require the understanding of large amounts of technical data and quick, informed governmental action have not rested comfortably within the framework of representative democracy. Absorption limits within society cannot be dismissed lightly.

A final, more general class of limits are those which result from limited imaginations. For example, over a decade after the introduction of commercial computers, the only general possibility which could be seen for their application was in record keeping, an extension of previous electronic accounting machine practice. The habit of early auto makers of providing buggy-whip sockets on their machines is a cliché which encapsulates this type of thinking. The evidence of public apathy towards the wonders of cable technology may well be another. Thus the ability of technical progress is subject to limits on how this technology will be used. In spite of the proliferation of think-tanks and futurologists, only a small minority of the population can think about the future in any disciplined way, with the record of the experts sufficiently spotty to make their imaginations suspect as well. This leads to speculation about whether we have been sufficiently imaginative about the potentials resident in the technology we already possess.

If we accept the arguments of the foregoing commentary and consider the future of the information arena within their context, we are forced to a surprising conclusion: The future of the information world is in the present and consists of a logical extension of elements already well established. Evolution and revolution have alike reached a plateau, but this does not mean the end of invention, nor, as will be demonstrated later, does it impose a significant limit on choice. Many combinations and permutations remain. It does mean that we need not face an endless replication of the process initiated and perpetuated during the past 50 years, because the gradual slackening of the socio/technical development should allow us to digest and develop current discoveries before being inundated by future ones. And this is as it should be. The present information arena (again as will be demonstrated later) is fragmented and has achieved only modest success in adapting existing technology to its needs. To evaluate the future within the information arena, then, we must consider current practices and developments and reflect on the facts and prospects we uncover. We must examine both the technological prospects and the information environment; they are inextricably linked.

Technological prospects

The technology available within the information arena has become sufficiently diverse so that it must be considered under several umbrellas: computers and large scale integration; long distance telecommunications; interactive cable television; optics and displays; film (Film as a storage, transfer, or teaching medium will not be discussed as a separate entity because no technical innovations beyond those already achieved loom on the horizon). What follows is a synthesis of expert opinion on the important developments in each of these fields. The data was gleaned from a comprehensive search of the current literature.

Computers and large scale integration: This field is seminal to the others. The economic importance of automation makes it the "forcing ground" for communications and related technology. Computers are essential to information data bases; indeed, computers are information media by virtue of their interactive powers.

The major new computer development is the large-scale integrated microprocessor which puts the whole architecture of a 1960s type computer on a single "chip" the size of a postage stamp. As a result of microprocessor development, we can expect software to be replaced in many cases by hardware in the form of dedicated microprocessor chips. This means that specialized minisystems (e.g. compact desk top calculators with programmable plug in read only memories) will become predominant. It also insures that the current picture of an expensive central processing unit served by cheaper peripheral devices will change in the future to one of cheap processing units served by more expensive and versatile peripheral devices. There will be continued development of super computers, but such machines will be "one shot" affairs built and programmed for specialized systems. The trend, then, is away from the one big machine towards distributed processing in smaller, more specialized machines.

Future gains in efficiency are expected to come more from interaction analysis rather than from hardware/software developments. This will occur because cheaper hardware makes intensive use of hardware less important, and so interactive computing becomes less special and thus more accessible for use. Other future expectations include: automatic management of processing units, including several processing units in tandem; fail-safe, self-diagnostic operations; interactive program development capabilities; and a more simplified system command language.

Another development involves memory and storage. Systems ten times the size of today's are on the drawing boards. Hierarchical development will lead to the emergence of the storage subsystem as the master system for computers. The development of high density bubble memories with no practical limit in terms of information density is one possibility. Another is greater utilization of semi-conductor technology as a replacement for magnetic cores. Further, mass storage will feature charge-coupled device memories tending toward microsecond access time. In addition, huge archival memories based on holographic technology and electron beam memories remain possible.

Yet another development of note concerns peripheral or interfacing equipment. Little performance improvement is foreseen in card reader/punch equipment, but nonimpact printers will improve and become cheaper. In fact, printers capable of 3000 lines (180 characters per line) are well beyond the drawing board. The most important interface peripheral will be the "intelligent" Cathode Ray Tube. The CRT, as it is known in the trade, will have a wide range of social uses (information retrieval, typesetting, graphics, point of purchase, or value data gathering, etc.). An indication of the advances in CRT technology is the development of interactive, color-shaded computer graphics in perspective with animation potential. Conversation as an input/output tool is experiencing revived possibilities as well, making the prospect of replacing the venerable filing cabinet with a voice-operated CRT much stronger.

Cybernetic applications are developing also. These include improved techniques in complex modelling, technology forecasting and assessment, disciplines, and comprehensive policy analysis for coping with subjective issues and diverse goals. At the industrial and educational level, improvements in pattern recognition and artificial intelligence (including more widespread use of robots) represent equivalent progress.

Finally, it is safe to say that the impact of the developments and trends on the future of computers and large-scale integration technology indicates that physical and theoretical limitations are already being reached. (See Figures 1 and 2 for a summary of future developments.) While scope exists for further developments, we should not expect any startling or radical advances. More important, the laymen for some years to come will still be faced with a "black box"; better, faster, cheaper, smaller, more versatile, but a "black box."

Long distance telecommunications: The commercial importance of broadcast telecommunications makes it a big business, and its importance to the information world is self-evident. Broadcast telecommunications takes in a wide spectrum of activities. The ubiquity, power, and importance of this technology makes it a certain focus for exploitation.

Among immediate development, the "SG" submarine cable providing 4000 two-way channels (a five-fold increase over its predecessor) is to be installed from the United States to France in 1976. The much ballyhooed Picture Phone (TM) is presently too costly for common use, but progress in integrated electronics, imaging devices, and band compression techniques will make it a practical item within the next decade. Continued progress is expected on coaxial cable technology, including four to six gigaHertz radio paths, waveguide technology, and optical fibers (the latter is expected to receive first application in helping to relieve urban communications congestion) will make long-haul digital lines a reality. Satellite services to remote areas will grow and have already proved feasible by the ATS-6 system which is providing experimental health care and educational services to Alaska.

In the near future, experts soberly predict that millions of computer terminals will tie into tens of thousands of computers in hundreds of different commercial, industrial, government, and educational networks, thus requiring more extensive data communication. Faster and more efficient data communication is expected as a result of current networking experience—especially that resulting from the Advanced Research Project Agency (APRA) network and the success of its interface message processor packet switching concept. Other lines of development in data communications to help deal with the expected surge in demand include: data-under-voice transmission, new common data carriers, improved satellites, higher speed modems, the integration of high-speed multiplexers and communications processors.

The future for earth bound systems is seen as the inevitable replacement of our present analog microwave systems by digital microwave systems. Examples of the sorts of things which will add to future communications are developments which have already been demonstrated, like digital TV recording and quadrophonic sound broadcasting. Also, implicit in the successful experimental operation of a consumer oriented electronic funds-transfer system is the "cashless society."

All of these demands make communications congestion an inevitable problem, so that it is evident why such exotica as the development of long-life lasers are being pushed as a solution to provide input for optical fiber transmission of telephone messages. And yet spectacular breakthroughs are unlikely in communications because of limits to the electronic spectrum, capital competition, a lack of sky room for satellites (communication satellites will soon fill all possible synchronous orbit positions), moral problems (the issues of privacy and the distribution of wealth), and consumer indifference. Consumer indifference as a constraint may seem strange in view of the acknowledged service demands made on the various communications systems, but the point here is that the average consumer understands the available systems so little that he is unaware of their potential and indifferent to their operational means. The result is an unwillingness to absorb development costs. In short, the possibilities of the future remain obscured by the dead hand of the present. (See Figures 3 and 4 for a review of current and future developments in the field).

Interactive cable television: The revolutionary potential of interactive cable television (CATV for short) makes it the herald of the next major communication innovation, on a par with printing and audiovisual telecommunication systems. The power of this innovation lies in its amalgamation of graphical technology, electromagnetic transport, and the electronic storage of graphical information. The true implications of CATV can be assessed by considering the "menu" depicted in Figure 5. (Even if a number of these services proved uneconomic or socially undesirable, there would be plenty of scope left.) The importance of CATV in future planning is heightened by the fact that CATV produces a change in the habits of the people exposed to it. (This includes changes in their lifestyle and the quality of their viewing selectivity over long periods of time.)

Although, the expectations for this new medium have not exceeded actual achievements, it is fair to remind readers that sober observers have always warned that the progress of interactive cable would be evolutionary rather than revolutionary. They stress two arguments: the technology and systems introduced were not new and, the enormous capital costs (a potential $20 billion per year industry). There is no question, though, of the ultimate domination of the medium. The question has always been when, not whether.

CATV represents the clearest and surest avenue to the wired city (the "everyone's connected," "all in the family," "global village" concept) because of the potential service channels available and our electronic capability to interconnect them all. There are 20 possible service channels now in actual operation, with 30 feasible in the immediate future. Since market saturation and system "noise" (conflicts and distortion) increase as service and channels grow, demand must be better focused and user interest much increased to insure progress.

Another problem which must be overcome for future development relates to the telephone system. Experts believe the integrated telephone/cable system is the best bet for the most efficient wired city. This requires the existing analog telephone system to be modernized. Future electronic exchanges function optimally when integrated in the cable network using digital techniques. The total overhaul of our telephone networks thus required is no trivial task, requiring time and money, and lots of both.

Satellites are foreseen as an important component in interactive broad-band wide area cable networks, because they allow instantaneous area coverage from a single repeater. The technological effort for such systems would seem to be justified by their possibilities, since such an information-handling system, like land and resources, would be a wealth generator on its own. This makes information systems the next dominant communication systems. (As for everyone who has tried to mail a letter lately can imagine, the problems in providing a modern postal service makes it a likely prospect for electronic translation, particularly since required facsimile technology is already well established.)

The basic CATV problem remains: at present developments reward the company which waits for someone else to do the trailbreaking. Everybody therefore waits for something to happen, which produces a self-perpetuating barrier against future progress. The fact that the basic factors inhibiting CATV are socioeconomic rather than technical makes some observers believe that such services may not gain acceptance until the 21st Century. In other words, don't hold your breath!!

Optics and displays: One of the more important subfacets of the information arena is the design of interfaces between man and machine and between sender and receiver. In communications systems this subfacet developed to the point where display technology has become an important design consideration in its own right. On the other hand, optics has a more general application to the communication, storage, and retrieval of information. The range of possibilities and the assessment of future developments is shown in Figure 6.

The most important technology for communication is fiber-optics: the transmission of images by bundles of tiny, transparent fibers, with both multichannel low cost, low light-loss cable, and effective connectors starting commercial production. New laboratory developments for fiber-optics include low-loss holographic couplers and fiber-optic multiplexing, while future emphasis in this field focuses on the development of fiber systems for launching, coupling, and detection components. A factor which makes fiber-optics development attractive is the growing scarcity of conductive metals. Further, their immunity to electromagnetic radiation makes greater applications for optoelectronic systems likely. Fiber-optics will also have important application for illumination, instrumentation, displays, and communications, the last two being most relevant to the information world. Recent developments in woven-fiber optics makes the technology useful for multi-ply image transformers, optical scramblers, and as a high-speed optical alphanumeric output device.

Another series of developments involves holography, which was originally considered to enable the development of home use holographic 3-D TV sets, movies, and cameras. (Yet 12 years after its invention we are as far away as ever from these products.) Instead, present emphasis is on using holography as a research and design tool (e.g. in nondestructive testing and as a high-capacity memory). Developments in holography have included acoustical holography as well as the more familiar optical type. Moreover, high-density holographic memory has been made more practical by the development of a nondestructive readout for the memory store. Another, more recent development stream involves the interaction of electronics and optics to charged coupled device imagers. These imagers have potential applications wherever video cameras are presently used, as well as in hybrid memories. Charged coupled device cameras have many advantages over the video camera tube, ranging from reduced size and power consumption to improved imaging capacity. One interesting exploratory combination (laser technology and charge coupling) has produced a prototype high-resolution page facsimile system, using broadband transmission at ten seconds a page. The same system technology can be used as a computer graphic terminal or an information retrieval display device.

1975-1978: electronic multiplexers and concentrators in telephone local loops; time-division multiplex switching for data communications

1979-1981: direct satellite channels for data users; single carrier per channel and time-division multiplex equipment for satellites; 18 to 23 GHz earthbound microwave links.

1982-1984: high reliability aluminum gallium arsenide laser diodes permitting long-distance optical telecommunications lines in the 0.8-0.9 wavelength region; 900 MHz portable telephone systems in cities; fiber optic telephone trunks; low-cost microwave equipment for short-hauls.

Adapted from "IEEE Spectrum's Key Area Forecasts." IEEE Spectrum, April 1975, p. 50-51.

Other developments of note in optical electronics include development work on microelectronic implants to provide limited prosthetic vision for the blind and the development of an experimental plasma panel flat screen device which can reproduce a wide variety of images and transmit them over distances. An application development is in recording television which has embraced disc technology rather than videotape recording. The former is much cheaper, both for playback system and individual discs, and more reliable.

The related area of displays has seen considerable development as well. For example, neon gas discharge displays are challenging CRT monitors in displaying computer messages, and the designer now may choose among light emitting diode, liquid crystal, nixie light, and plasma display technologies.

Clearly we have two classes of development work in optical technology and displays: that which is still in the laboratory stage and will not be commercially feasible for several years, and that which is on the verge of being produced but which tends to represent a different (improved) way of doing the same thing. The experiences in television recording technology are a case in point. The technology which was to revolutionize home entertainment was ultimately discarded in favor of an alternative technology which will prove less revolutionary because its basic artifact is fixed (disc) rather than variable (tape).

The information environment

The discussion of the technological prospects affecting the information arena should have illustrated two factors: 1) Progress in information work will depend on the successful application of technological innovations. 2) Information technology is neither developed in nor transferred through a vacuum. Obviously, then, we must consider the information environment in the matrix within which it will be implemented. This matrix evolves from information problems, information institutions, information management, and information training. (Information training will not be discussed in this article, though its importance should be obvious. Information workers must be trained to understand the technological prospects and operational constraints they face, and information schools must require their educators to address the larger problems which will be discussed.)

Information problems: Our information problem is simple to characterize: We have such an abundance of information that we are unable to effectively use what we have now, much less the future bounty. Since everyone seems to agree that information is among the most important raw materials in the modern world, why this dilemma? Chiefly because many information problems cannot yet be identified with sufficient prevision and those that have been identified have proved either difficult or impossible to resolve. The most obvious problem is the "volume" crisis, a crisis which is endemic to the field and a good case in point. Unlike many of the others, it is easy to see and to solve, but . . .

The value of information is directly related to its utility for someone. In order for information to be used the information must be selected, ordered, processed, and made available in a reasonable time. This implies providing an information service. Since no single information service unit, regardless of size, has ever been capable of acquiring and processing all the information required to fulfill its user demands, it must look to alternate solutions. The most obvious (and most often used in the current marketplace) is the attempt to link its data and artifact types to corresponding information service units. The operational/financial problems which have resulted correlate to information increases and are gradually becoming insurmountable. Put another way: the greater the size of the information file, the larger the number of working components needed; thus, the more difficult and costly the operational problems, particularly if the constituency to be served is both discriminating and demanding.

Even within this information context the physical, operational, and intellectual problems faced by information managers is formidable. Some productive work has been done, but more study is needed before useful results can be achieved through the new technology. Areas requiring further investigation include: system access problems (networking), system transfer mechanisms (inter/intra information loans), retrieval description strategies (to determine resource selection and resource location), organizational relationships (legal and financial relationships), and storage problems.

Other, more difficult information problems are physiological/psychological and relate to the functions of the user. The results of research into the workings of the human brain must be assimilated by information system designers. We now know that man's human consciousness span, thus the brain's input capacity, is limited, with a threshold value much lower than the rate of knowledge expansion. This may partly explain our inability to keep pace. The problem of recall from the brain is even more frustrating. Most psychologists now believe that the brain stores all sensations received; yet even though only a fraction of this is available for recall (at speeds which are incredible) at a given time, this is usually adequate to the occasion, at a depth ranging from superficial to intensive. The trouble is that no one yet knows how the brain achieves its relevant recall or how its file is organized. Comparing the flexibility of natural memory to the restricted syntax of available information systems (whether manual or machine) demonstrates the limited progress humans have made on such systems. What this phenomena seems to imply is that the final utility of the many technological prospects described earlier for information systems will ultimately be determined by our ability to understand ourselves.

Obviously, these information problems are not all the direct responsibility of the information community. However, information workers must be aware of progress in related fields and must seek to apply it imaginatively to their environment. Otherwise, failure will be a constant in their future.

Information institutions: The principal vehicle through which information workers have, to date, provided information services to society are social institutions. For the general public these institutions are their access point to knowledge and technology. Accordingly, unless the reader believes information institutions are optimal, changes within their present roles are essential to the realization of identified information resources. There have been some institutional changes, but despite this evolutionary progress (particularly the development of special information centers) recent institutional developments of consequence have been minimal. (In fact, ground is being lost in our larger public and university libraries and there seems little hope for immediate improvements.) In other words, the new services offered by new or existing information institutions represent a change in degree rather than kind. However, changes may be difficult to obtain because of the nature of the information institution; that is, the fact that it is an institution may impose a host of constraints that cannot be overcome. Libraries as institutions are a good example: the perspectives of the librarian and the user seem irreconcilable, as the following discussion will show.

From the user's viewpoint, current library information management does not relate to the new information technology. It applies principally to the printed page and still works "in paper," preserving outmoded dissemination methods as well as knowledge. The user, aware that a multitude of technical developments in library media are capable of bringing the new day closer, is understandably impatient and blames professional inertia for restrictions and the inadequacies of institutions to available technology.

From the librarians' vantage point it's a different picture. The new technologies do not provide totally new services; they inevitably increase costs (which users as taxpayers have been notoriously reluctant to support); and they often impede service because they require social engineering to reduce their institutional drawbacks. One example is the concept of service specialization like the tape scientific reference and distribution services which greatly reduce response time. In societal terms users of such services are few, self-selecting, and capable of negotiating their complex information demands. But such a solution cannot be applied to the public at large without a massive educational effort. Further, they only exacerbate a fundamental problem which has plagued librarians for years: copyright. We know the prospect of a scarcity of resources portends necessary changes, thus paper shortages and mircofilm technology development may make a realization of Bush's MEMEX more likely for certain purposes. But which purposes? The microfiche represents a new unit of information with revolutionary implications for libraries (give, not lend). However, if implemented it is certain to create more serious problems than it relieves. Further, since money is always a constraint and the users determine the institution's functional responses, money limitations and user biases will affect emerging systems and policies, perhaps to the detriment of overall service optimization. (What to do? Is it the greatest good for the greatest number? Is it need vs. wishes?) The following brief series of examples underscores some of the conflicts between user demands and institutional constraints implicit in accepting new technologies for libraries:

Middle class consumption biases have had a disproportionate effect on cable television service types.

The high unit costs of video cassettes reduces their great educational impact.

The introduction of new library dimensions through the computer requires money, databank use strategies, a new type of library employee, and greater management burdens.

The conditioning responses manifested by the public in response to traditional electronic technology (e.g. the telephone) creates unrealistic attitudes to such services as offered by libraries.

In short, new technologies provide institutions with added cost, many headaches, and more extensive inhibitions surrounding their use than the outside observer realizes. Yet public expectations make new service demands inevitable without a corresponding appreciation of the difficulties involved.

In addition, one institutional drawback, a myth, has proved a formidable obstacle to progress—the library's free information services tradition. This myth (information was never free) distorted public expectation. The free information tradition (initiated by the so-called Carnegie Free Libraries) makes people resent the cost of new services, further impeding institutional responses. (A book service mode was cheap enough to be easily feasible, but the new technologies have exorbitant capital costs, making the "electronic paperback" easily feasible but economically impossible.) The future of information institutions may well rest on the resolution of this problem. For the moment we do not seem to be getting any closer to lasting solutions.

Information management: As should be self-evident the role of information management is to mediate between information technology and information institutions to facilitate their effective planning, organization, control, and operation. The process requires appropriate use of specialized tools (machines) and techniques (practices). These aspects of information management will not be the subject of this discussion (although even a cursory review of the information arena would demonstrate that information practice has not kept pace with technical developments). Instead the discussion will focus on two pivotal developments, networks and information utilities, which are symbiotically linked. Neither is a new concept, but together they are the key to the future.

Networks: The operation of information communications networks is not new to information institutions. Interlibrary loan and shared bibliographic and acquisitions programs go back many years. Moreover, the experience gained from traditional information networks should have provided the necessary background for implementation of the improvements possible due to technological breakthrough; since networks change less in function than in technological form. For example, despite the introduction of new electronic technology (computers and specialized peripherals) universal network problems remain similar. Despite technical advances, delays in system throughout optimization require a careful approach to the pecularities of each application problem; while present transmissions and access efficiency (machine to machine conversation) compete to make optimum network configuration so difficult that the result is either exorbitantly expensive or is rejected by the user because of insufficient human engineering. In addition, a new dimension, invasion of privacy and copyright intrusion, has been added, forcing the development of new standards for regulation.

From the information manager's point of view, the problems, despite the potential benefits of successful implementation, have an extensive range and represent a series of nightmares:

Technical problems include needs for funding, insuring that the data is structured properly, the requirement for servicing simultaneous user requests, other communications problems, data/language translation problems, extension requirements for computers, and the need for operating and data management systems.

Social problems for the information manager include user training, system size and social impact, potential hazards to individual integrity, and the need for safeguards for security reliability. Resolving each element adds years before the availability of each system.

Further, we know current commercial information systems practicing in the information arena display arbitrary assumptions, fads, confusion, and more than the occasional inadequate results. We also know that the novelty of information engineering has resulted in complex systems and that future developments include decentralized systems and higher level languages. The requirement for increased expansion in the information field is growing. Integration of human and information factors is still poorly understood. Better systems design (with the user in mind) is essential. New channels for technology assessment are required. The need to improve technical communication remains critical. New methods and systems in information organization and packaging are needed. Information limitations of data banks include unexpected survey/maintenance expenses and difficulties in assuring an adequate match between requests and responses. Toward all these challenges, hardware is only a partial solution. Management is left with the problem of determining system sufficiency every step of the way or the process will be abortive.

Information utility: The information utility represents a more complicated future development because it represents the final step, the ultimate connection among man's tools and practices, the circuitry of the "wired city." This implies a marriage between all of the technologies discussed and a solution to most of the problems described. If completed, the system would have made available the total information file and allowed us each to extend ourselves at our own speed towards our own interests and individual excellence. The route: the electronic, self-paced thinking and entertainment centers.

We now see that the original projections for the information utility were oversimplified. The range of problems already described in this article; coupled to the crippling financial burden and real question of the social desirability of such a service have tended to push back its development. Some day, though, in some form, the concept will be implemented, for it represents a major alternative to our present educational system. It may even prove to be the ultimate social adjudicator.

A view from Plato's cave

During the discussion it was argued that the future of the information world is contained in the present status of its components; that the information arena is marked by superlative technology, experienced people, and inadequate functional organizations. During the discussion two by-products emerged: one attempted to demonstrate that false prophesies and expectations are dangerous, and the second should have demonstrated that such false prophesies have been rife within the information arena, since more often than not technological forecasts and ultimate results have had little or nothing in common. The danger is distortion and lies not only in misleading the general public in their expectations of the sorts of service available to them, but also on the future work in the field itself. It was also suggested that overconcentration on a high-technology future means ignoring more obvious and fundamental problems which require solution first. Finally, all of the foregoing has serious implications for the education of information workers. If their education is biased towards structures which may never see fulfillment, they are not being trained to cope with the world which inevitably awaits them. This leads to a circular progress in an arena already populated by inefficient workers looking to others and the future for solutions rather than into themselves.

One cannot help but speculate that at the root of our response to the challenges of the future in the information arena is the age-old problem of appearance and reality. Two thousand years ago, Plato expressed this problem in the indelible image of the cave. Men were compared to the dwellers in a cave, who saw shadows of real things projected on the wall of the cave, lit by a fire behind their backs. But until men were taken by the mouth of the cave where they could see the sun and the real world of daylight they would continue to believe the shadows on the cave wall were real things.

We seem to be in a 20th-Century version of Plato's cave, with one important difference. The new technologies (particularly telecommunications and the TV set) represent the inversion of the Platonic cave. For we continue to sit outside the cave they represent, looking in to see reality, rather than looking around us. But the images are still images; only their fidelity has changed. This improvement in image fidelity makes the real even less accessible, since the illusion is more convincing to men's mind than mere shadows. But, no less than Plato's cavemen, we must seek reality if we are to find solutions for our problems.

Today is tomorrow. But, come to think of it, so was yesterday.

There are 41 steps in library binding...

Creating a library bound book is not an easy job. It's an involved process consisting of 41 different steps . . . each designed to provide the finished volume with the strongest, longest-lasting binding possible.

But the first, most important step must be taken by you, the librarian. You must insist upon having the books and periodicals in your collection bound in accordance with the LBI Standard.

If you want to increase the usefulness of your collection, yet keep costs to a minimum, take that first step today. Send for free brochures on the advantages of library binding and contact a library binder who displays the LBI seal.

GRAPHIC ARTS MANUAL 1976

The one indispensable guide to creating, producing, and purchasing printed materials.

Over 100 articles and thousands of directory listings provide detailed coverage of:

- Color theory and measurement
- Design of printed products
- Manuscript-preparation techniques
- Type and typography
- Composition from hand-setting to computerized page makeup
- Art preparation for black-and-white and color printing
- Photography and illustration manipulation
- Graphic arts photography and stripping
- Platemaking for all printing processes
- Printing and its control
- Paper and other substrates
- Inks and their applications
- Binding and finishing operations
- Fulfillment processes and data
- Law and trade customs
- Graphic arts associations
- Colleges and art schools
- Competitions and awards
- Periodicals
- Printers and platemakers
- Typesetters
- Binders and finishers
- Paper manufacturers and distributors
- Ink manufacturers

HIGHLY RECOMMENDED

MATH WITHOUT TEARS
By Roy Hartkopf

"The author should be commended for the ease with which he handles complicated mathematical concepts. His anecdotal approach in which he indicates through a plain story the nature of a given concept, can be emulated by many mathematics teachers. His skeptical attitude toward some of the sacred cows of mathematics is very refreshing and, in some cases, amusing. He covers the field from the basic concepts of arithmetic through logarithms, nomography, graphs, trigonometry, series, and calculus. This is a broad spectrum of subject matter to cover one book: but by sticking to basic ideas and not getting involved in detailed calculation, Hartkopf succeeds admirably. Although the book is aimed at adults not specifically trained in mathematics, bright high school youngsters can read it with pleasure and profit. 151 line drawings. Highly Recommended."—Library Journal

Tools for the Information Community

by Susan K. Martin

THE TOOLS of the information community have not changed radically for centuries. As a rule, "messages" are placed on some "hard" surface, such as paper or clay tablets, for communication to others. Inventions which facilitated this process without changing its conceptual basis are the printing press and its variations, the typewriter and its variations, and the 35mm camera and microform readers. The telephone, of course, has also become an essential part of our communication apparatus. The progress of technology from the clay tablet to the microform reader is apparent, but as long as the display and manipulation of data remained bound to manual procedures, the human approach to information did not change radically.

Then, in the early 1950's, computer technology invaded the industrial and commercial worlds. The information community was no exception. With the operating speeds and flexibility of the computer, very little seemed to be beyond accomplishment. The "Red Book"[1] which described the future of automation at the Library of Congress is an outstanding example of one attempt to explore the capabilities of this new technology; like others, however, the authors were not able at that time to grasp the complexities of the task they were proposing. The early flush of power felt by the information professionals gave way within a few years to a cynicism born of multiple failures, poor planning, and inadequate funding.

In the next few years we will witness a spiral rather than a cycle. The initial enthusiasm for the potential of the new technologies to assist us in handling information will return. However, the intervening experiences with technology, the self-evaluation of the early 1970's, and tight economic conditions will prohibit a return to the starting point. This time, development efforts will slowly and carefully spiral our traditional approaches to information from the posture of the past centuries to one which will take increasing advantage of the unique and special characteristics of a computer-based technology. This shift has just begun; in the next 25 years we will see changes, but we will perceive their enormity only in retrospect.

For all practical purposes, pre-1965 information technology focused on experimentation with machine-readable data and computers. Libraries used tabulating equipment and small computers to print out lists of periodicals from punched cards; information services and publishers began to realize the benefits of machine-readable publication; and all segments of the community felt the effect of machine-based fiscal systems, either within the parent institution or externally. The advent of third-generation computers with highly increased capabilities and speeds coincided with the initiation of the concept of a standard format for representation of Machine-Readable Cataloging (MARC) data.

The past decade has seen wide acceptance of this format. MARC was developed at the Library of Congress with the extensive participation of librarians and other information professionals nationwide, and has since been used throughout the world. Having established the format, the Library of Congress began to convert bibliographic data to machine-readable form. Many other libraries followed suit; libraries involved in independent conversions of bibliographic data could either translate their records to the standard format or not, as they chose. At the same time, information services and publishers were amassing machine-readable bibliographic data. By 1975 libraries held at least four million machine-readable records, although the extent of overlap among data bases could only be estimated.[2] Additional millions of records representing journal articles, technical reports, and a variety of subject-oriented materials were held by a large number of publishers, information centers, and commercial members of the information profession.

While converting data to machine-readable form, the information community spent the decade working on standards for a variety of uses, all of which are in some way related to the tools of the community and the computer which produces them. MARC is considered by many to have been the major breakthrough. But in addition, we now have at our disposal the International Standard Book and Serial Numbers (ISBN and ISSN); these numbers are already in use as facilitating descriptors of specific bibliographic items for communication among publishers, information centers, and libraries. The International Standard Bibliographic Description for Monographs (ISBD(M)) is now in use in the United States as well as in other parts of the world. Its sibling for serials, ISBD(S), is still in draft stage. Among other standards completed or in process are those of standard numbering schemes for institutions, technical report numbering, and codes for languages and countries. When taken as a group, these standards will impose a structure on the large "national data base."

In the past decade, the increased capabilities of the computer brought to the information community changes which began to be felt only slowly. The computer that accepts machine-readable data and creates camera-ready copy by the process called photocomposition gave publishers and information distributors the ability to manipulate the data which comprise the basic document, allowing automatic index generation and increased access by key words. Simultaneously, computer-output-microform (COM) products have begun to replace microform tools based on document reduction. Books and book catalogs are now photocomposed rather than typeset; microforms are COM-generated rather than photographed; and economic factors point to the gradual supplanting of book catalogs with COM catalogs. Less attention has been paid by traditional information distributors to such areas as computer-aided reference service, and collection development. The youngest member of the information community—abstracting and indexing (A&I) services—was created in response to the need for rapid dissemination of and access to special bodies of data. The A & I services generated specialized data bases, and information services arose to act as disseminators when it became apparent that most libraries could or would not easily act in this capacity. Only within the past year or two have libraries felt the need and the ability to offer their clientele a wide range of in-depth computer-assisted reference service.

Materials selectors have made use of computer-produced tools in some libraries, but relatively little emphasis has, until recently, been placed on this important function in the national context. An increasing tendency of academic libraries to identify collection development as a task separate from acquisitions and reference has focused attention on the needs of collection developers, resource-sharing, and collection development policies. Columbia University Library's 1973 automated shelflist analysis and the clearinghouse of the Research Libraries Group[3] are pace-setters.

Computer terminals

A giant step toward acceptance of a nontraditional approach to information was the use of computer terminals for interacting with large data bases. Whether typewriter or cathode ray tube (CRT), these devices, more than any other specific technological event, signal the modification in behavior which will be required of information disseminators and users in the future. Thousands of people in hundreds of organizations nationwide are using terminals to gain access to data. They have a significant head start in the techniques of manipulating the information sources for the remainder of the century.

The most important factor in the development of the tools of our profession during the next decades is the existence of large and growing files of bibliographic and nonbibliographic machine-readable data. With machine-readable data a level of flexibility is now available that will require years before the full potential afforded by this technology is recognized. On-line access, exchange of data, machine-based authority control, and in-depth searching of reference data have been made possible. The standards which have been slowly and carefully created place a structure on these data, facilitating their widespread use.

In 1976 we are already accustomed to tools which reflect at least some, if not all, of these techniques. Different forms of catalogs, based on converted data are familiar: on-line catalogs, microform and book catalogs, custom listings, selective dissemination of information (SDI). Some communication occurs in the form of magnetic tape or punched cards from book vendors to those libraries which are able to process machine-readable invoices. Many special information services and libraries provide their users access to large reference data bases such as MEDLINE, Chem Abstracts, and ERIC. Large numbers of institutions already cooperate on the basis of machine-readable data; the most prominent example of this phenomenon is the Ohio College Library Center (OCLC).

During the next decades the variety of tools made possible by large amounts of data in magnetic form will become increasingly difficult to ignore. It will be apparent, for example, that the existence of the MARC data base plus the records of a few large libraries will overlap almost entire collections of smaller institutions, providing "instant" conversion, with only the necessity of reconciling local call numbers and holdings.[4] A glance at specific tools and techniques may be useful in analyzing the possibilities.

Economics, staff, and politics

The many factors which determine the course of events in the life of an institution prohibit any glib predictions of that institution's nature in 20 or 30 years. We know today's technologies and have hints of tomorrow's potential technologies; we might use this knowledge to predict the use of technology by the information community in the next decade or two. However, we cannot easily forecast the effect of economic factors which would allow us to quicken our pace of development or force us to a stroll. Nor can we guess the magnitude of the role of staff organizations, by diverting funds to salaries, in limiting the institutional ability to invest in technology.

A third vast unknown is the effect of politics on the corporate members of the information community. Voices other than our own may dictate the schedule for bibliographic cooperation, resource-sharing, and automation. Although, as a professional community, we may accept common general goals, the administrators of our parent institutions may temporarily adopt other goals, creating another hiatus in our slow progress towards a stated or unstated ideal. For these reasons, this discussion of the tools of the information community, while remaining a prediction, is not limited to one or two decades. One or more of the above factors, or others that have not been mentioned, could cause a prediction to be wrong. A more cowardly prophet might call these predictions "possibilities."

Bibliographic description

There is no reason to believe that the inexorable pace of change in practices of bibliographic description will suddenly cease. The next edition of the Anglo-American Cataloging Rules will be published in 1977 and the movement of the Library of Congress toward closing obsolescent manual files to rely on easily "updatable" machine-readable records will provide a focus for development of bibliographic tools. The effects that this change will have on the nature of the tools will depend, at each institution, on the three factors mentioned above: economics, staff, and politics. At the present time, many libraries base their processing on machine-readable data but offer traditional formats, catalog cards and worksheets, to users and staff. Gradually more libraries will rely on computer-assisted processing, usually through a network. In addition, the possibility of linking the in-depth subject access to special libraries and information centers to the overall bibliographic controls of general libraries will be explored. The problem of barriers between the public and private sectors must be resolved in order to provide full benefit to each segment.

To alleviate personnel costs and space problems, a number of large libraries will close their catalogs. Although LC's stated intention to close its catalog will undoubtedly draw many institutions to follow exactly the same pattern and schedule, some libraries will precede the bandwagon. The New York Public Library closed its catalog several years ago, and the Ohio State University Library has announced its intention to close the catalog on July 4, 1976. Typically, book or microform catalogs will replace the card catalog. The costs of CRT's, and the concomitant communications costs, will prevent sole reliance on on-line catalogs for large libraries in the near future. It is likely that a mixture of on-line, book, and microform catalogs will provide at least an interim configuration for access to bibliographic data in all segments of the information profession.

Through special funding, one or more large libraries will convert retrospectively its entire collection to MARC-like records. Although retrospective conversion has been regarded as economically impossible since LC's RECON study[5] placed the cost at over $1.50 per record, more recent studies in other institutions indicate that less stringent requirements for data may lower the cost by as much as 50 percent.[6] It is no longer unreasonable to predict that within this century a very large proportion of our bibliographic data will be accessible through machine techniques.

Structured data bases allow manipulation and modification of the data. Because of the tendency of the information community to modify practices from time to time, with the changes in vocabulary and subject emphasis which are imposed by society, the manual systems are the objects of complaint by users and staff, who find the inconsistencies and anachronisms difficult to tolerate. The New York Public Library heralded a new age in authority control when it developed a system capable of making mass changes with one transaction, such as altering all "Aeroplane" subject headings to "Airplane." Mass file modifications of this nature will become commonplace, allowing 1) conformity with current practices of bibliographic description, 2) adherence to current terminology, and 3) reconciliation of bibliographic descriptions among institutions.

As LC expands the scope of the MARC distribution service, as more libraries become involved in cooperative processing, and as information centers and publishers share data throughout the community (as with the Cataloging-in-Publication (CIP) program), less original bibliographic description will take place at the institutional level. "Shared cataloging" will increase. However, it is unlikely that there will be a sharp reduction in the number of technical processing staff required. In order to close out manual operations, a library must have little or no backlog, a relatively clean existing catalog, and flexible staffing patterns. Only gradually will most libraries find it possible to reallocate from technical services functions to either in-depth processing tasks, collection development, or public service areas.

Acquisitions and collections

While cataloging librarians exchange bibliographic data, book selectors and acquisitions librarians are being urged by almost universal financial stringencies to share information before purchasing material. For this function, the basic working tools will not change immediately. Selections will be made from trade journals, publishers' flyers, national bibliographies, and locally generated requests. After selections are identified, however, a new step will be inserted. Unless the item selected is designated as a mandatory purchase, it will be necessary for the selector or an assistant to check existing files to see if the item has been ordered or cataloged at other institutions with whom collection or resource-sharing policies have been developed.

One part of the tool to support this procedure already exists and has been in use for decades. All union catalogs, whether national, regional, or local, can serve as guides to book selectors. The OCLC data base has demonstrated that this facility is easily translated to machine-readable form. As a next step, data regarding the on-order materials of libraries will be incorporated into bibliographic data bases, allowing query of not only completely processed materials, but all materials in process within each participating institution. The information industry has begun to facilitate this expansion of data bases by providing data to the Library of Congress for Cataloging-in-Publication, and LC itself is making its Process Information File available. In general, the inconsistencies caused by using the "nonauthoritative" in-process records will be deemed as tolerable.

A final and necessary part of materials selection is a collection development policy, until recently inarticulated in most libraries. Some effort has been made to use computer-produced tools to assist in establishing or refining collection development policy; the shelflist tables generated by the RTSD Discussion Group of Collection Development Officers of large research libraries are typical of these.[7] It will become apparent that the growing data bases held by many institutions will prove valuable in assessing the nature of current, if not retrospective, collections. By using information generated from data bases held by their own institutions and comparing it to those of other institutions, materials selectors will be able to apply the severe criteria necessitated by limited funds in a more reasoned manner than has been possible in the past.

Vendors of library materials will also become part of the information transfer process. Libraries and information centers will be able to send vendors purchase orders in machine-readable form, either on magnetic tape (batch mode) or by using telecommunication (on-line). In return, vendors will submit in machine-readable form invoices which can then be processed not only by the library but also by its parent institution without additional keyboarding (except in the case of errors). The standards developed for communication throughout the information industry will be required in order to provide this mechanism in a satisfactory manner.

Public catalogs and circulation

It has been widely assumed that circulation systems would be incorporated into network development, that libraries would share the bibliographic data to support the circulation function, and that each transaction would update the on-line file to display to all participating institutions the availability (or lack thereof) of any volume held in any member collection. The volume of transactions of local data required to implement such a system is far too burdensome for a computer network which is already absorbing a large volume of technical processing activity. The recent development of minicomputer circulation packages indicates a growing trend toward local operation of local files and functions. Data will be exchanged between the major bibliographic files held in the network or large computers, and the local minicomputers. Status information regarding lost, missing, or unbound volumes will be communicated from the minicomputer to a master file. When appropriate communication procedures are developed, interlibrary loan transactions will occur as a function of telecommunication between two or more minicomputers.

A political problem impedes the development of networked circulation: the sensitive nature of patron files which are necessary in order to locate and retrieve circulating materials cannot be ignored. The question of privacy is difficult to resolve even within a single organization; it will take considerable time before a solution to this problem is reached.

Although on-line access to full bibliographic data for the library user will be slow in arriving, the economics of the on-line minicomputer circulation system are such that its brief bibliographic "inventory" will be made available for public inquiry, supplementing book, card, or microform catalogs for full data and for subject access.

Reference services

Machine-based tools have been accepted for years as a valid resource of the information community. The information industry, information centers, and libraries all disseminate to users the results of data base searches. Until recently, much of this service has been at no cost to the consumer, based on the traditional theory of the library profession that libraries should not charge for services. However, it will be economically impossible to continue to give away specialized services such as data-base searching. Across the board, libraries and other information organizations, will charge fees for production of special lists and data, either on a one-time basis or as a subscription.

We will see little or no expansion of the range of subjects covered by data bases; indeed, it is likely that one or more of the existing proprietary data bases will go out of business or be incorporated into other services. As users are required to pay for retrospective searches or SDI services, requests will decrease radically. Those services which are able to survive the initial shock will regain customers gradually as our society becomes accustomed to paying for these specialized information services.

With the promulgation of standards such as the International Standard Serial Number and the use of these standards by both library and abstracting and indexing agencies, it will become feasible to link library-oriented bibliographic records and holdings with A & I-generated content analyses. Taken to logical extension, users will no longer be condemned to a double look-up in order to find both a relevant work and the location at which it can be found. The ISSN and other universally accepted codes will provide the bridge between the general and the specialized data base, permitting a level of access and service previously considered impossible or prohibitively expensive.

The information profession will go one step further. Followers of MIT's Project Intrex[8] will recall that its prediction of the library of the year 2000 focused on natural-language indexing and computer retrieval of citations and microformed documents. An emphasis on national bibliographic control, requiring input by all segments of the information profession, will allow at least partial realization of the ambitious and optimistic future described by Project Intrex. The abbreviated bibliographic data derived before publication with the assistance of the publisher (CIP data) will be expanded to include an abstract plus natural language indexing terms selected by algorithm as a by-product of the photocomposition process. The further analysis performed by abstracting and indexing services will strengthen the information base used for each bibliographic record. The record itself will have provision either for incorporating index and abstract terms or for linking the bibliographic file with the file of abstracts. This transfer of information from publisher to information center to library and/or library network will be a vital step, transforming the information process from an insular and repetitive series of tasks to an interactive and increasingly effective system.

The means of change

The foregoing prophesies about the future of the tools of the trade are incomplete without some discussion of the means whereby this evolution will take place:

The phenomenon of computerized library networking has been under way in the United States for over five years. In order to facilitate the creation of tools for the remaining years of the century, networks must expand and flourish. No single institution is able to carry the burden of converting and maintaining a regionwide or nationwide file of bibliographic records and holdings; such a file must be the joint effort of a large number of libraries and information centers. Existing and future information networks will provide the mechanisms for data collection and for the development of expanded systems and capabilities to serve an increasingly large number of users, both institutional and individual. In 1975, only one online network for technical processing was operational: OCLC. However, Stanford's BALLOTS system was rapidly approaching networking capability. The Washington Library Network, the University of Chicago Library, and Northwestern University Library, among others, have or will have on-line systems which will be capable of communicating and sharing data with other systems. In addition, reference and communications systems and networks such as Lockheed's DIALOG, SDC's ORBIT, and Tymnet are active and growing.

The national self-evaluation and planning which began with the establishment of the National Commission on Libraries and Information Science (NCLIS) in 1971 are also in the formative stages. Featuring a published program for a national system[9] and an upcoming White House Conference on Libraries and Information Science, a broad-based attack on the problem of funding, planning and public awareness is being implemented, with as yet unknown effects.

Meanwhile, the Council on Library Resources and the National Science Foundation have joined together to sponsor a Joint Advisory Committee on National Bibliographic Control, which is to work within the framework of NCLIS activities. Because of its emphasis on representation from the A & I segment of the community, it is possible that this Joint Advisory Committee will expediate some of the tasks required in order to merge the information generated by each segment of the profession. This committee and NCLIS are vital for a logical development of information services in the United States; the rapidity with which this occurs will depend, however, on surrounding economical and political factors.

Future milestones

To summarize the above mentioned major problems or questions which will be solved during the coming two decades:

- The exchange of data between the public and private sectors will be resolved. In 1976, single institutions are able to purchase data or services from single commercial organizations or information centers. Contracts by networks with the private sector are complex, and, therefore, rare. The question of redistribution of machine-readable data must be addressed, as well as network use of commercial products and services.
- A communication protocol will be established for sending queries and responses in machine-readable form from one institution to another. This protocol must identify the sending and receiving institutions, and the nature and the content of the message. Differing machine codes and speeds must also be accommodated.
- Use of technology to gain access to (as well as convert) bibliographic data will become widely accepted. Minicomputers, on-line terminals, and microforms are no longer rare occurrences in the information community. It will become increasingly clear that the advantages of these technologies do, in the long run, offset the problems arising from staff and user re-training requirements. Many libraries will close their card catalogs, relying on on-line systems and microforms.
- A solution will be identified in order to accept into a national data base bibliographic records from retrospective data bases which are not authoritative or do not conform to current bibliographic practices. It will be perceived that the volume of these "unofficial" data is too great to ignore, and that machine techniques may be used to either minimize the inconsistencies or provide a modicum of authority work. In addition, full on-line authority control will become a reality.
- Because funding will remain a problem, libraries and information centers will learn techniques for implementing new and better procedures without incurring the heavy costs of extended operation of parallel systems. Built into these techniques should be sound justifications for moving to new procedures, including formalized planning, and evaluation of "the way we've always done it."

These "predictions" about our working tools are simultaneously optimistic and cautious. However, if the information profession continues to stress the need for better planning, exchange of data, and improved services to the public, evolution of the tools will be a natural accompaniment to the attainment of these goals.

LIBRARY AUTOMATION: changing patterns and new directions

by Richard De Gennaro

IN 1967, the literature of library automation was still very limited in scope and fell into two categories. At one extreme were the detailed technical papers written by systems librarians describing a specific application which was being implemented in a particular library. At the other extreme were general or visionary papers written by information scientists or librarians speculating on how computer technology was going to change libraries in the future. There was little in between to which librarians and administrators could turn for practical guidance on whether and how to plan, implement, and administer automation programs in their own libraries. In an attempt to meet that need the author, who was then responsible for systems development in the Harvard University Library, wrote a paper entitled "The Development and Administration of Automated Systems in Academic Libraries" which was published in the first issue of the Journal of Library Automation in 1968. It was reprinted in the ASIS collection Key Papers in Information Science.[1]

The paper was in two parts. The first part made it clear that there were no canned formulas for automating a research library that were waiting to be discovered and applied. Each library was going to have to decide for itself which approach or strategy seemed best suited to its needs and resources. Three major approaches were described: 1) the wait-for-developments approach, 2) the direct approach to a total system, and 3) an evolutionary approach to a total system. The use of outside consultants and contractors was also considered. The second part of the paper dealt with the important elements of any library automation program regardless of the approach that was used. There was a section on the building of the capability to do automation, including considerations of staffing, equipment, and organizational structure. This was followed by a discussion of the relative merits of the various kinds of projects that could be selected such as serials, circulation, acquisitions, and cataloging, and it concluded with some views on costs and benefits.

Now, eight years later, the author was asked to write another paper on library automation from an administrator's point of view.[2] During those years remarkable progress has been made in automation as well as in the scope and quality of its literature. Gone are most of the hastily written descriptions of applications as well as the worst excesses of the visionaries. They have been superseded by works of solid quality in both areas and the gap in between has been filled by studies such as Herman H. Fussler's Research Libraries and Technology, among others.[3,4,5]

In casting about for an appropriate focus for this paper, it seemed essential to review the earlier one to see how well it had stood the test of time and how it could possibly be brought up to date. It came as no surprise that much of what was written there about this rapidly changing and developing field was no longer pertinent or useful. Many of the most important and controversial issues of the sixties have long since been resolved or have simply become irrelevant. However, the main theme of the paper—the identification and discussion of the various approaches to automation and the strategies for pursuing them—has retained its importance as the major current issue in library automation. It seemed appropriate therefore to use the basic approaches to automation that were outlined in the 1968 paper, along with the other issues covered, as a vehicle and framework for highlighting the changes that have occurred and the new approaches and directions that are discernible in library automation in the United States in the mid-seventies.

Library automation in the late Sixties

In the mid-1960's there were two highly publicized pioneering projects that did not fit into any of the three most common approaches that were discussed in the paper. One was the Florida Atlantic University project and the other was Project INTREX at MIT. Florida Atlantic, a newly founded university committed to using computer technology to innovate new paths in higher education, decided to build a totally computerized library apparatus in lieu of conventional library card catalogs and other manual systems.[6] While providing some useful experience, the project proved to be entirely premature and was subsequently abandoned. The task was simply beyond the state of the library and computer art and technology of the time. However, the national and even international publicity generated by this project created tremendous interest, incentive, and pressure for other libraries to enter the field. It is hard to assess the legacy of Florida Atlantic, but without it we may have had fewer failures and a more orderly development of the field.

The motivating idea of Project INTREX was that rather than attempt to automate existing libraries it would be far more fruitful to use the advanced technology to build a totally new kind of library which would parallel the conventional one and eventually transform or even supersede it. In the words of its founder, "The goal of Project INTREX is an information-transfer system to be installed by 1975 not only at MIT but at a number of comparable institutions throughout the nation and perhaps the world."[7] After seven years of expertly managed and reported experimentation and development and the expenditure of several million dollars in grant funds, Project INTREX declared that it had achieved its objectives and quietly went out of existence in 1974.[8] On the theoretical side its impact on library and information technology was considerably less than its promise. On the practical side it left little to show for its efforts beyond a handsomely refurbished Engineering Library and a prototype on-line interactive data and textual access system based on computers and microfilm that is apparently still too expensive and experimental for use in an operational environment. In its highly sophisticated way INTREX may have been just as ill-conceived and premature as the more amateurish Florida Atlantic initiative.

The "wait-for-developments" approach

The wait-for-developments approach to library automation was based on the premise that computer-based library systems were still in an experimental stage with questionable economic justification, and that it was unnecessary and uneconomical for every large library to undertake difficult and costly development work. Most libraries should wait until the pioneers with special grant funds had developed workable systems which could be installed and operated at reasonable costs. Princeton was cited as the chief proponent of this approach.

The 1968 paper suggested that this was a reasonable course of action for smaller libraries, but that for larger ones it entailed the risk of being left behind as technology developed, and that in any case it would be difficult to hold to this policy in the face of the then current pressures to automate that were coming from all sides in that decade when technology was riding high. In retrospect, it is now clear that the advice to wait for the pioneers to develop workable systems would have also been appropriate even for large libraries. With the coming of austerity, the pressures to automate subsided. The fear of being left behind proved to be groundless because the technology changed so rapidly that many of the libraries that entered the field early were locked into obsolescent systems while those who waited had little difficulty entering at the current state of the art when they were ready. Princeton joined a fully operational PALINET, the Pennsylvania regional affiliate of OCLC, in 1974, thereby avoiding the pains as well as the pleasures of being in the forefront of a new movement.

In 1975 this cautious approach still seems like the most prudent course for most libraries to follow with regard to original systems development. However, many of the developments that we have been waiting for are here and ready for implementation. The wait-for-developments approach should be in fact an approach to dealing with technology, not just an escape for it.

The direct approach to a total system

This approach was based on the premise that since a library is a single complex operating system and all its varied operations are interrelated and interconnected, logic demands that it be treated as such and that a single integrated or total computerized system be designed for it. The tasks could be designed and implemented as a series of modules, but all must be designed as part of a whole. The University of Chicago and the Stanford University Libraries were cited as the prime examples of this approach and both had received substantial research and development grants from government agencies and foundations.

The 1968 paper suggested that the total systems approach was somewhat beyond the state of the art of both library automation and computer technology; that while trying it was a gamble that could pay off, it seemed doubtful that the first models would be economically and technically viable and that the best that could be hoped for was that they would work well enough to serve as prototypes for later models. It was suggested that while this bold approach would unquestionably advance the cause of library automation it presented serious risks for the library that adopted it. In retrospect, this appears to have been a reasonably accurate forecast of what actually occurred. Only two large academic research libraries, Chicago and Stanford, embarked upon this approach (in 1966 and 1967 respectively) and both are persevering to successful but diverging conclusions. However, each has found the task several times more difficult, costly, and time-consuming than it had originally anticipated.

Chicago's first generation bibliographic data processing system allowed data to be input to an in-process file at the time of ordering or cataloging either from local terminals or from MARC tapes and produced cards and other printed products for the library. Upon completion of this system around 1968, Chicago made a new beginning with an entirely new design concept. The second generation system performs a full range of administrative and reader services via the library's Varian minicomputer, which has direct access to a master data file in the university's large IBM 370/168 computer. Chicago's comprehensive data management system is expected to achieve full operational status in 1976 and be made available to other libraries under the terms of a Council on Libraries Resources grant that it recently received.[9,10] It should be capable of being used either as a stand-alone system for an individual library or as the central system for a regional network.

Developed at considerably greater expense, the Stanford system, called BALLOTS, is an on-line interactive system with multi-file and multi-index capabilities and using video display units in such a way as to allow for its extension, in phases, from technical processing support to other areas of library operations and eventually to serve as a central system for a library network.[11] Although it has been supporting the day-to-day acquisitions and cataloging operations of the Stanford libraries since November 1972, operational costs in this mode are excessively high and efforts are currently underway, as a result of a recent CLR grant, to make the expansions necessary to permit the system to support a large-scale network for California similar to OCLC.

The original conception of the designers of these systems and the granting agencies that funded them was that they could be transferred to other large libraries when they were completed. There appears to be surprisingly little interest in this possibility now. Experience seems to indicate that these systems are too costly to operate in a single library environment, and most libraries have moved beyond the idea of having their own dedicated system and seem to prefer to join consortia such as OCLC and its affiliates. Stanford is actively trying to promote BALLOTS as a node for a western library network and this is undoubtedly where its future lies. Chicago is still trying to develop a system which can be used either by a single library or by a group of libraries. But in spite of Chicago's efforts, it can be said with considerable justification that the ultimate goal of library automation in the 1960's, the development of a total integrated system for a single library, appears to have been abandoned or at least set aside in the 1970's. However, there are indications that the advent of powerful and inexpensive minicomputers and storage capabilities will lead to a revival of this concept in the next few years. We will return to this point later.

The evolutionary approach to a total system

The ultimate objective of the evolutionary approach was the same as the total system approach but the method of reaching it was different. In the evolutionary approach, the library was supposed to move from traditional manual systems to increasingly complex machine systems in successive stages to achieve a total system over a period of time with a minimum of cost and risk. It was viewed essentially as a series of do-it-yourself projects with librarians and computer specialists working together as a team designing separate batch-processing or on-line systems for various housekeeping functions such as circulation, ordering and accounting, catalog input, etc. This was and still is the most common approach to automation and was adopted by Harvard, Yale, British Columbia, and many others.

In 1968 this seemed to many librarians to be the most reasonable approach to computerizing the operations of a large academic library. By 1972, the state of the art of library automation and computer technology had advanced to a point where the objective of a total system for a single library as well as this conservative strategy for achieving it both seemed irrelevant. Our perception of the task to be done had changed from developing a single comprehensive system to automate or computerize a library to making the most effective use of technology to support library functions. As the technology became more functional it began to lose its aura of glamor, and librarians began to see it more as a tool to do library work rather than as an end in itself. Two new approaches to the use of technology were emerging. The OCLC system had proved itself and the validity of the cooperative on-line network concept for handling bibliographic data while the inexpensive minicomputer package system for handling certain local functions, such as circulation and acquisitions, was showing considerable promise. These new developments and trends will be treated in more detail later.

Building the capability for automation

Following the descriptions of the various approaches to automation, the 1968 paper discussed some of the major requirements for a successful automation effort regardless of the approach that was selected. These requirements included staff, equipment, and organizational considerations. This part of the paper has suffered the most from the passage of time and the course of developments. Much of what was said is no longer relevant because it was assumed that each library had to build an in-house capability to automate its own operations and this basic assumption is no longer valid. This do-it-yourself or localized era of library automation that characterized the 1960's is giving way to new approaches in which libraries join computer networks such as OCLC or its affiliates for some functions and perhaps install package minicomputer systems for others. In either case, a highly qualified in-house technical staff is becoming less essential as regular library staff members develop the competence and confidence to implement and operate these advanced on-line package systems.

Staff—"No one is threatened . . ."

The question of who was to do library automation—librarians or computer people—was one of those burning issues of the 1960's which simply faded away. The paper suggested that a mixture of both types would be needed, but that as systems and equipment became more sophisticated the need for computer expertise would take precedence. This view was sustained by subsequent developments. At present, it is difficult to distinguish the computer people from the librarians as each has taken on the characteristics of the other and no one feels threatened any more. As a matter of fact, many librarians who chose to specialize in computer work during the heyday of the movement in the 1960's are reorienting their careers back to regular library work which they correctly perceive to be the main stream of the profession in the long run.

The concern expressed over the shortage of experienced library systems people in the face of the "ever-growing need and demand" seems particularly outdated in the face of the current shrinking demand for computer specialists in libraries. A small elite of highly skilled and dedicated systems people continues to be needed in the main centers of activity such as the Library of Congress, OCLC, Chicago, Stanford, Minnesota, the New York Public Library, and a number of others.

Equipment—turning to networks

Another very live issue of the 1960's was how a library could gain assured access to the computer time that it needed to test programs and run its routine jobs. Computers were changing "generations" every few years and university computing centers were unreliable and unstable. The unresolved question was whether libraries would continue to rely on computing center machines or whether their usage would grow to a point where an in-house library computer could be justified. Since computers were growing in power, size, and cost, and since it was clear that libraries would require the use of powerful on-line systems, it seemed unlikely that a trend toward in-house library machines would develop. This proved to be the case, but instead of using the general purpose machine at the computing center, an increasing number of libraries are turning to the computer-based library network to satisfy their computing requirements. Although few libraries want or need their own full-scale computers, many are casually installing powerful in-house minicomputers for circulation and other applications, and this trend will surely continue.

Organization

It was assumed that large libraries which elected to automate would require a permanent and growing systems group, and it contained a number of ideas on how the group might be organized, administered, and made to fit within the regular library structures. It foresaw a future where the library's automated systems were always being changed, enlarged, and improved, and program and system maintenance were a permanent activity. This is very much the way it was and still is for those libraries that have elected the evolutionary approach described earlier. However, the continued viability of this approach is open to serious question, as has been suggested, and some large libraries have already abandoned it.

Project selection—end of an era

This subject was of vital concern to the library automation fraternity in the decade of the 1960's, and the merits of the various projects were widely debated. Some advocated beginning automation with the serials check-in records because the most activity and the largest payoff was there. Others thought that it should begin with the order records because that is where the records first entered the system. Circulation had its advocates because it was relatively risk free. After some discussion of these questions, which are no longer live issues, the 1968 paper suggested that the development and acceptance of the MARC II format in 1967 marked the end of one era in library automation and the beginning of another. In the pre-MARC period, because of the lack of a standard format, every system was unique; in the post-MARC period it was foreseen that automation would be facilitated and expanded in the coming years. An input sub-system for cataloging in the MARC format, which individual libraries could use, was promised as an imminent development which would enable libraries to make full use of the MARC tapes to which they would soon be subscribing.

The MARC format and distribution service did in fact signal the beginning of a new era of accelerating development in library automation, but the success of OCLC and other on-line systems dramatically changed the direction of that development. Instead of each major library subscribing to and maintaining a file of MARC tapes and developing a local system for utilizing them as was initially predicted, it turned out that the emerging pattern is for libraries to utilize on-line terminal access systems and MARC data bases that are centrally maintained by networks or even commercial vendors.

Like many other issues which were critical in 1968, the issue of project selection has lost its meaning as library automation has evolved from an experimental localized activity in individual libraries to a service supplied to groups of libraries by a centralized consortium or network.

Costs—still high

Many of the views about the costs and benefits of library automation in the 1968 paper still retain their validity. Attention was called to the high cost of developing original systems and software, and today one would confirm this and add a warning about the high cost of operating and maintaining such systems. Another major concern at that time was whether or to what extent automation could be justified on the basis of cost effectiveness. The paper suggested that computer-based systems as they then existed would not actually save a library money if all development and implementation costs were included. Their advantage lay in providing better systems with the greater capacity that was thought to be essential to enable libraries to cope with the steadily increasing growth rates and workloads which were overtaxing the traditional manual systems.

Unlike many of the other issues which have faded away with the advances in technology, the issue of costs and benefits has increased in importance. Although the argument that computer systems are needed to take care of increasing growth and workloads has lost some of its strength as library budgets and other growth indicators have begun to level off and decline, rapidly increasing personnel costs caused by rising salaries and benefits have given it a new force and urgency. Nevertheless, it is still possible to say that the actual cost savings of the localized systems that characterized the last decade were either minimal or nonexistent. The first really significant savings that have come to libraries from computerization have come from the OCLC system and its affiliates in the area of personnel costs in cataloging and technical services.

Less easily demonstrated, but still real and increasing, are savings and benefits that will come to libraries indirectly as a result of the successful computerization of services, functions, and tools by organizations that serve libraries. For example, the computerization of the Library of Congress bibliographical apparatus and subject heading list facilitates the production of printed catalogs and lists and other tools upon which libraries depend. The growing capability of the OCLC data base to serve as a location device for interlibrary loan searches is another important example. The computerization of the data bases of various indexing and abstracting services has made it possible for commercial vendors and others to provide libraries with effective on-line search services to expand their reference capabilities.

New directions

We come full circle and can now summarize and project the four main lines of development that are discernible in the mid-1970's:

1) State and regional computer-based networks or consortia are developing into a national system, not only for sharing on-line processing systems, but also for locating and sharing library resources.

2) Parallel vendor-supplied on-line services and systems both for bibliographic searching and document access as well as for supporting local library processing functions, are developing.

3) Transferable minicomputer systems designed to support a wide range of library functions with a possible future tie-in to the network data bases and systems, have developed and commercially available packaged minicomputer systems for specific functions such as circulation and acquisitions.

4) There is a trend toward in-house development and transfer or adaptation of local systems.

The remainder of the paper will be devoted to a discussion of these four main trends.

Networks—a new maturity

Since it went on-line in 1971, the OCLC system has profoundly changed the nature and direction and quickened the pace of library automation in the U.S. OCLC has been the most significant development since the establishment of the MARC format and distribution service and has achieved a commanding and well-deserved lead in the area of cooperative computer-based library networks. The parent OCLC network serves Ohio while 11 other affiliated networks serve New England, New York, Pennsylvania and the Middle Atlantic, the Southeastern U.S., and Texas. Several other regional consortia are negotiating terms for participation. The ease with which libraries can participate effectively in the OCLC system has been chiefly responsible for the change in direction of library automation from the development of local systems for individual libraries that characterized the sixties, to the participation in cooperative networks that is dominating the seventies. It is clearly easier and less expensive for libraries to get the benefits of automation by joining networks than by attempting to develop their own stand-alone systems. Even the networks that are affiliated with OCLC, after an initial interest in replicating the OCLC computer system for use in their region, have largely abandoned this idea in favor of continuing to use the central OCLC system which is rapidly expanding its computing capacity to meet the growing demand. This willingness of libraries and even consortia to use an existing system signals a new maturity in library automation where the focus is on the product rather than on the process or the glamor of developing new systems. OCLC's demonstrated capability of serving as an effective library resource-sharing mechanism has also been an important factor in the rapid acceptance and growth of the network concept in the austere seventies.

Although OCLC clearly dominated the eastern half of the U.S., Stanford's BALLOTS system is making a serious bid to become the center of library networking in the West. Several consortia, including the University of California system, are seriously considering affiliating with BALLOTS, which is said to be technically equal or even superior to the OCLC system. Indications are that the University of Chicago system may also be available to support a major network.

As we try to assess OCLC's future, it appears that the two main capabilities upon which its current success is based—shared cataloging and catalog card production and distribution—may be largely superseded by advances in library automation and in the OCLC system itself. As the Library of Congress and other major producers of MARC cataloging abroad step up the currency and broaden the scope of their output until near complete coverage is achieved, the importance of OCLC's shared cataloging capability may diminish because libraries will draw virtually all of their cataloging from the data base and will only contribute original cataloging for limited quantities of retrospective, locally produced, and other special materials. Moreover, as the Library of Congress and other major libraries begin to move in the next several years toward closing their card catalogs and implementing some combination of on-line and computer output microfilm catalogs their need for catalog cards will diminish. Smaller libraries will continue to need cards, but they may be able to obtain them much less expensively from other sources including commercial vendors. Thus, the continued use of the OCLC system as a massive card production and distribution service in the next decade may be seriously open to question.

On the other hand, the use of the OCLC data base and system as a source for machine readable catalog entries for use in local systems will probably assume the same importance that catalog card production and distribution now have. In addition, the use of the system for union catalog and interlibrary loan location and communication purposes as well as for subject searching and other bibliographic reference functions is bound to increase and may well become its dominant functions.

OCLC's ability to deliver and successfully operate the long-promised serials control, acquisitions, and circulation subsystems is not yet certain. Although work on circulation has not yet begun, the serials control and acquisitions subsystems are under development and will soon be available. What is much less certain is OCLC's ability to expand the capacity of the computer system sufficiently to handle the vastly increased storage and processing burden that will be placed on it when several hundred member libraries try to use these additional capabilities. It may well be that such locally oriented functions as serials control, acquisitions, circulation, and catalog maintenance and access will have to be done on minicomputers which may be interconnected to a large regional or national data base such as that maintained by OCLC. This concept will be further developed later.

Vendor supplied services and systems

While this trend toward vendor-supplied services and systems is not yet as widespread and significant as library networking, it has much in common with networking and is growing rapidly. Just as it is more efficient and cost-effective for libraries to obtain certain services from a network than to try to develop the capability themselves, it may be equally advantageous for them to turn to vendors for other systems and services. Vendors in this context are not limited to commercial firms, they can also be large libraries, professional societies, government agencies, etc. This approach has not been important in the past because few vendors had any fully-tested operational systems or products to offer, but this is changing now. A number of vendors have developed effective systems and many libraries have begun to use them.

The System Development Corporation and the Lockheed Information Retrieval Service, among others, are providing libraries with access to a growing number of on-line bibliographic data bases, including the MARC file, on a fee-for-service basis. The commercial availability of these services appears to be resolving in a highly satisfactory manner what was once considered to be one of the most difficult problems in library automation, namely, how libraries could develop and offer computer-based information retrieval capabilities to their users.[12] Until recently, the end product of these on-line bibliographic searches was a list of citations which created as much frustration as they did satisfaction because they called attention to documents that libraries did not have or could not easily procure. Now it is possible to actually order copies through the on-line terminal of certain of the items that have been retrieved in a search. These are limited for now to National Technical Information Service (NTIS) reports and articles that are available through the Original Article Tearsheet Service (OATS) of the Institute for Scientific Information, Inc. However, this capability may expand as the indexing and abstracting services embrace the responsibility for providing copies as well as the opportunity for additional revenues that the service appears to afford.[13] The extension of these search services to include convenient access to documents in addition to citations could be one of the more significant developments that has occurred in library and information technology in the last several years. The availability of complete bibliographic access systems through on-line terminals would have a profound impact on traditional library acquisitions policies as well as on the future of scholarly journals. However, the document ordering capability of these systems is still rudimentary and it is too early to assess the long-term significance of these developments. It is quite possible that demand will be limited and that users will balk at paying the high fees that the suppliers will require to make the service profitable and viable.

The large book jobbers use computer systems for their own internal processing and are therefore in a favorable position to offer computer-produced cards, lists, and other services to their customers. Customer libraries will soon be able to tie directly into the jobber's data base and system through on-line terminals and communication lines. By 1980, nearly all catalog data in Roman alphabets will be available through the MARC service, and international standard book and serial numbers will be widely used. This will undoubtedly open new possibilities for system linkages between jobbers and libraries.

Other firms maintain the MARC data base on their computers and offer a variety of products and services including cards, book catalogs, and subject searches, thus making it unnecessary for small libraries to cope directly with any level of automation or technology to benefit from computerization. As technology becomes more complex and cost-effective, and as book and journal prices along with salaries and personnel benefits continue to rise in the face of static budgets, some libraries may find it advantageous to buy products and services rather than to attempt to produce them in-house.

There are, of course, serious risks that come with purchasing vital library services from commercial vendors, and special caution is indicated to guard against the misleading claims and promises of the unscrupulous or incompetent entrepreneurs that exist in this field as in others. Moreover, even reputable vendors with useful products and services can also fail or be forced to abruptly discontinue an unprofitable line, thereby exposing their customers to serious inconvenience and unrecoverable losses.

Minicomputer systems

A third significant trend is the development of minicomputer systems capable of handling in an on-line mode a variety of library processes such as circulation, acquisition ordering and accounting, serial control, and catalog access. Two projects typify this trend; one is the Minnesota Bio-Medical Minicomputer Project and its application to the main library at the University of Minnesota, and the other is the efforts of CLSI, Inc. of Newtonville, Massachusetts.

The statement was made earlier that the ultimate goal of library automation in the 1960's, the development of a total integrated system for a single library, was largely superseded by the drive toward networking which was sparked by the success of the OCLC system and reinforced by the Chicago and Stanford experiences which showed that the cost of operating such systems was probably too high for one library to bear. Bucking this strong trend, the University of Minnesota Bio-Medical Library is attempting to achieve the total system goal of the 1960's by using the technology of the 1970's—the minicomputer and inexpensive mass storage. With a grant of $360,000 from the National Library of Medicine in 1972, the Minnesota Bio-Medical Library embarked on a three-year project to develop a low-cost, stand-alone, integrated library system which would be suitable for use in other libraries of a similar size. "The premise of the development is that an integrated acquisitions, accounting, in-process control system for all library materials coupled with an on-line catalog/circulation control system can be operationally affordable by a library or system of libraries in the 200,000 volume class using its own computer system."[14] Apart from the usual delays, the project appears to be progressing so satisfactorily that a proposal has been made and approved to apply the same concept to the main university library at Minnesota.[15] The design of these minicomputer systems calls for their being capable of interfacing with and being linked into the regional networks and their data bases. If this concept proves itself, it could become the dominant trend in library automation and networking in the next decade.

The other major line of development in minicomputer systems comes from the commercial sector. CLSI, Inc., of Newton, Mass., appears to be the leader in this field and is already offering standardized circulation and book ordering and accounting modules using its own software package and an off-the-shelf minicomputer and other components. It has installed several circulation systems but the acquisition system is not yet available. The entire system, software and hardware, is sold or leased to the library at prices which may be advantageous when compared with the cost of developing, operating and maintaining a local in-house system. The installation and maintenance of these packaged or "turnkey" systems are the responsibility of the vendor; the library needs no machine-oriented systems staff, it is free from the vicissitudes of dealing with a university computing center, and it retains a measure of independence and flexibility as technology develops. CLSI will soon be joined by Checkpoint-Plessey, Check-A-Book, and other vendors using a similar approach as the market develops. The market for circulation systems appears to be strongest since the networks are not yet offering this capability.

Development and transfer of local systems

Closely related to commercially available packages are complete systems for particular applications that have been developed by certain libraries or centers for their own use and are being offered for sale or transfer at cost to other libraries. A few major examples can be cited. Ohio State University's on-line circulation system is being transferred to the State University of New York System and Purdue University, among others. The Hennepin County (Minn.) Library used the California Bibliographic Conversion System to convert its catalog entries, and then processed them with New York Public Library's book catalog system to produce a book catalog. The New York Public Library is planning to adapt and install the acquisition system originally developed and used by the Columbia University Library. These and other successful ventures suggest that systems transfer, after many years of unfulfilled promise, may finally be possible now that there are some systems worthy of transfer and technical people with the willingness and competence to make the transfer. Libraries are beginning to overcome the "Not Invented Here" syndrome, and systems transfer may occur more frequently than it has in the past.

Many major research libraries, including for example the New York Public Library and those of the universities of British Columbia, California (Berkeley), Minnesota, Northwestern, Ohio State, Oregon, Washington State, and Toronto are continuing to retain systems staffs and to design, implement, and operate in-house systems for various library functions. Others are maintaining and improving existing systems with in-house staff, but are not initiating new systems. Still others, such as the University of Pennsylvania, have completely phased out their systems staffs and are relying completely on networks and outside sources for new systems and for the maintenance of existing ones. This latter course is a trend which may be expected to grow as networks, utilities, and minicomputer systems continue to develop and dominate the field.[16] Naturally, the Library of Congress, because of its enormous sze and unique function, will continue as one of the major centers for research and development in library automation.

The next phase—synergy

During the years under review we have seen the main thrust of library automation evolve from building total or integrated systems for individual libraries using local systems staffs and equipment, to building regional library networks using the systems, facilities, and staffs of a few major centers such as the Library of Congress, New York Public Library, OCLC, Chicago, and Stanford. We have also seen the parallel emergence of a new concept at Minnesota, namely, the development of a powerful, flexible, and inexpensive minicomputer system for use in a single library. If this concept proves itself, it could combine some of the best features of the total systems goal of the 1960's with the major success of the 1970's—the cooperative network. This marriage could produce what may become the dominant thrust of the 1980's—the development of cost-effective in-house library minicomputer processing and catalog access systems capable of interfacing synergistically with an effective national library network for sharing bibliographical data and library resources.

F.W. Faxon Company, the world's only fully automated library magazine subscription agency, has offered service to all types of libraries since 1881. Over 18,000 libraries in the United States and throughout the world rely on Faxon to order and renew their magazine subscriptions from a selection of over 17,000 titles. They place one order and receive one invoice, instead of the hundreds of orders and invoices they would have to handle if each magazine were subscribed to individually.
Faxon is continuing to develop and perfect exclusive automated systems to provide libraries with the best magazine subscription service available. Send today for more information and a copy of our free Librarians' Guide.

Jacques Maritain: Homage In Words and Pictures

John Howard Griffin and Yves Simon

John Howard Griffin, author of Black Like Me and The Visual World of Thomas Merton, first met the Maritains in France as the result of their mutual friendship with the French poet Pierre Reverdy. When Griffin regained the sight he had lost due to war injuries, his camera and diary notes recorded their continuing visits and the unguarded moments of the eminent philosopher. The best of these photographs and the most touching of remembrances are combined with Simon's synopsis in words to form this unique memorial. The photographs include Maritain at his home in Princeton; with Griffin's family at Fort Worth, Texas; with Thomas Merton at Gethsemani; and the last days of the philosopher at his retreat in Toulouse. A fine introduction with some historic importance and, in its own way, a work of literary and visual art.

Seventy-five 8½" × 11" pages, 30 sepia duotones. LC 73-85056/ISBN 0-87343-046-8. $12.95

"Simon reflects on Maritain's contributions to many branches of philosophy, and Griffin portrays in reverential portraits and words, the final edges of the aged and gentle life. A handsome memorial, in sepia on cream paper." Booklist

"Another treasure. A most perceptive study of Maritain both as a person and as a philosopher. A moving tribute . . . superb photographs. Griffin adds to the homage in words the limpid and sparkling diary he kept of his visits." National Catholic Reporter

"A stirring, a loving memorial. Griffin is a superb photographer as well as a writer. The text is complemented with a handsome binding, richly textured paper and a beautiful composition of the photographs among the pages." Independent Press-Telegram

"One could scarcely think of a more appropriate team to collaborate on a tribute to the memory of Jacques Maritain." America

RAÏSSA'S JOURNAL

"The one book of this decade certain to be recognized, sooner or later, as a great spiritual classic of the century. Even Thomas Merton has not left us such writing as we now have in Raissa's Journal." The Church World

"Arresting in its own right." Christianity Today

"Altogether it is an incredibly beautiful testament. It is destined, I think, to be a spiritual classic." The Catholic Review

Shortly after Raïssa Maritain's death from cerebral thrombosis in 1960, her grief-stricken husband, Jacques Maritain, began to go through her papers. Among them he found a set of journals Raïssa had kept over the 54 years of their life together. Jacques knew that she kept diaries, just as he did, but he had no idea of their true nature until he read them after her death.

The journals so overwhelmed him that he had a selection published in a small private edition for their friends. Jacques asked each recipient to help him decide whether or not these intimate pages should be made public through a regular book edition.

Few people have written more starkly and vividly of the spiritual life. Few have had the perceptions that come from a life of utter and absolute abandonment to the will of God, perceptions in Raïssa's case supplemented by the highest poetic gifts and philosophical learning.

The initial reaction of such friends as Thomas Merton was that these notes were too powerful and too searing to be made public, even though he felt enormously privileged to read them himself. Others expressed much the same reaction. In almost every case, however, such friends had second thoughts and encouraged Jacques to allow a regular edition of Raïssa's Journal.

They appear here for the first time in English, in a translation corrected, revised and approved by Jacques Maritain before his death in 1973.

FIGHTERS FOR FREEDOM,

Lithuanian Partisans Versus the U.S.S.R. (1944-47),

by Juozas Daumantas.

L.C.C. No. 74-33547. Photographs. Cloth. $9.95

This is a factual, first-hand account of the activities of the armed resistance movement in Lithuania during the first three years of Russian occupation and of the desperate conditions which brought it about. The author, a leading figure in the movement, vividly describes how he and countless other young Lithuanians were forced by relentless Soviet persecutions to abandon their every-day activities and take up arms against their nation's oppressors.

After having broken through the Iron Curtain in 1947 to plead his cause before the West, the author returned to Lithuania in 1950 and was killed by the Soviets a few months later.

Processing for the People

BY THE YEAR 2000, unless something happens to deflect the current juggernaut, all processing will be solely Library of Congress (LC) based, or worse yet, will emanate from LC and the uncontrolled data base of the Ohio College Library Center (OCLC), consistent with policies determined by a research library biased American Library Association (ALA), and studies funded by the Council on Library Resources (CLR).

This possibility is not new, at least regarding LC and ALA, but its realization grows closer:

> The rules issued by the . . . catalog committee of the American Library Association (ALA) are expressly designed to be made for the use of a learned library. The old catalogs were not made for children, but the modern ones have to be, especially in a circulating library, for the children are the library's best clients. That the [ALA catalog] committee has always understood the public's views, estimated correctly its power of changing them, and drawn the line in the right place between a conservative regard for custom and a wish to lead the public toward a desirable simplicity and consistency is too much to assume.[1]

Charles A. Cutter stated this at the turn of the 20th Century in the introduction to his final edition of cataloging rules, and more importantly on the occasion of the end of the "golden age of cataloging." The "golden age" was ended with the anticipated universal availability of LC cards; essentially each library would no longer need to do its own cataloging nor have its own staff of catalogers except for those few needed to handle the small percentage of titles not covered by LC.

In the late 1960s, Cutter's warning became even more urgent. Prior to 1968, libraries had many sources from which to meet their cataloging needs, plus some remnants of a local staff. In 1964[2] and 1969,[3] articles appeared in Library Resources and Technical Services (LRTS) and in other places listing processing center products and services, both nonprofit and commercial, available in the United States. An examination of those listed reveals that a full range and variety of cataloging services were available. Some nonprofit ones provided by Maurice J. Freedman

full LC cataloging and others used Sears subject headings, abridged Dewey numbers, and title page author entries. Some commercial firms furnished one or the other, or a choice of the two. (Although cataloging and processing are not synonymous, for this paper's purpose they will be used somewhat interchangeably. As it is the basic cataloging data which forms the nucleus for all processing services, such components as pockets, spine labels, etc. cannot be created without the prior production of the cataloging record.) In addition to LC as a main source, many cataloging services were available either on a regional basis, primarily used by public libraries, school systems and in some rare cases even academic libraries; or nationally, commercial services used mainly by college, public, and school libraries. Centralization and standardization before the advent of MARC and massive computerization allowed various kinds of libraries to select either jointly or separately a processing service which furnished cataloging data tailored or suited to their respective libraries. The diversity of distributors and their lack of absolute dependence on a single source for cataloging data permitted them the freedom to choose from among the many established authorities and to attempt to be more responsive to the diverse needs of their customers or users. In a 1964 article, for example, Elizabeth Adcock pointed out that in a response to a vote of one center's users and a change in policy by one of the center's commercial sources, the center changed from LC to title page author entry.[4]

The existence of a variety of commercial and centralized processors, many of whom independently selected and defined the content of the catalog records they created and distributed, had benefits and drawbacks. On the positive side, they could attempt to meet the needs of their narrowly defined constituencies. Already cited was an example of a given processor which switched to title page author entry because of its greater suitability for its member libraries. Some of LC's subject terms are particularly unsatisfactory for nonresearch libraries. For example, the Sears List of Subject Headings uses the explicit and direct term, "Busing (School integration)," while LC calls it "School children—Transportation." Card formats from central processors are frequently simpler and more intelligible than the LC card, eliminating such descriptive items as city of publication, spine size, and lengthy notes, while providing valuable annotations. In Westby's directory of processors, there are sample cards illustrating this point.[5] Note that LC currently provides annotations and alternate headings for children's books—a valuable service.

But the multiplicity of standards and the various exceptions to the standards contributed to conflicts in the individual catalogs. One can find a short history of processing services embedded in many public library catalogs. LC cards, LJ cards, Wilson cards, local processor cards, and handwritten nonprofessionally produced cards, intermixed in the same catalog with their concomitant inconsistency in entry and format, frequently added up to a dismal situation for their patrons.

Although there have been many social and political movements up to and through the 1960s, they seemed to have little effect on the racist, sexist, colonialist, and other slanted headings perpetuated by LC's canonization of prevailing bigotries (e.g. "Mammies," "Kafirs," "Women as librarians," "Yellow peril," "Jewish question," etc. ad nauseum);[6] LC's anachronisms such as "European war, 1914-1918," "Motor-trucks," "Moving pictures," etc.; and LC's failure to recognize new terms before a large segment of materials on that topic are cataloged under an improperly general term, such as "Rock music" being put under "Jazz" years after rock was created, all of these criticisms were basically ignored by the dominant cataloging authorities.

Because there were a large variety of processing services and still some local cataloging staff, at least some of these centrally disseminated horrors were properly dealt with and not enshrined in some neighborhood 3 x 5 card tray. As we approached the present era of automation, standardization and inflation, there did exist some variation in local practice, and as pointed out, not all of it for the good. Processing for the people, certainly as coming from LC, was not a reality, but on the other hand cataloging had not yet been totally divorced from the reality of local needs.

Automation and standardization

Automation in libraries did not begin to have a major impact until the late 1960s and early 1970s. The automated cataloging systems in various stages of development around the country were built to accept or enter into the computer, cataloging data, but not to provide bibliographical control. With one exception, the New York Public Library automated system,[7] these systems did not automate any of the professional cataloging functions such as authority checking, establishment of entry, cross-reference control, etc.[8] (This is an especially important point to keep in mind regarding the OCLC system and data base.) By 1975 the impact of automation has become overwhelming. The three largest library jobbers all have MARC (*MA*chine *R*eadable *C*ataloging) based catalog card and processing services. (MARC is the service wherein LC currently sends out weekly in computer readable form its current cataloging information for English language and some other Roman language titles.) LC's Catalog Distribution Service (formerly the Card Division) is sending to its subscribers computerized "letterpress quality" MARC based cards (as well as letterpress, offset, and photocopies of other cards), and the Ohio College Library Center, the nation's most ubiquitous alternative, is mailing out over half-a-million cards per week (as of July 11, 1975).[9]

However, the OCLC system has some drawbacks. Insofar as there is no rigorous bibliographical or authority control built into the system controlling the entry of cataloging information into the OCLC data base, OCLC is a threat to the traditional integrity of the catalogs of all of its member libraries, not just the nonresearch libraries. But it is important to note that "integrity," such as consistency in the form, spelling and fullness of entries, is no longer a universal value. Many librarians feel that the retention of traditional cataloging values is no longer economical. To them the sloppiness embodied in several entries for the same work, a not uncommon occurrence in the OCLC data base, is not a drawback. To me it is bad service because it will lead, at least in some cases, to the user not finding a work that is in the collection. The traditional integrity of the catalog, be it on-line, card, book or microform, does not necessarily have to be sacrificed in the name of automation and cooperation.[10]

ISBD—the wrong kind of rule

Concomitantly the drive toward standardization, advanced in the names of international cooperation, economics, and efficiency (Motherhood was omitted), and substantially financed by the Council on Library Resources, has seen an almost lemming-like pursuit of "international standards," or most recently, "universal bibliographical control" (UBC). Originally billed as an optional format required for the purposes of computerizing catalog data, the International Standard Bibliographical Descriptive (ISBD) with its esoteric punctuation conventions and Latin abbreviations was adopted officially as a tool enabling the research libraries of the western world to communicate cataloging information.

Many public librarians feel that ISBD has little value, that it will further confuse their users. While no study has been attempted demonstrating this negative effect on the user, the original ISBD proponents did no formal user study either. Assuming that the lack of studies are a tradeoff, other considerations could be most informative. Seymour Lubetzky, one of the greatest theoreticians of descriptive cataloging, publicly decried the ISBD as being unnecessarily redundant because it requires the author's name after the title, even when it is identical to the main entry, and it introduced confusing punctuation.[11] Lubetzky's objections were numerous, but in brief he rejected ISBD.

ISBD is the wrong kind of cataloging rule to be taken up at the international level. In a discussion of what should be the concerns of an international cataloging code, as well as national, regional, local, and bibliophilic codes, S. R. Ranganathan was most helpful. For Ranganathan, when librarians of different nationalities sit down to create an international code, they should only accept past practices of permanent value, be free from > lower emotions, such as decadent imperialism, inhibiting camp bearerism, prejudice of colour, east-west or realistic-practical, and every other kind slogan-phobia. As a meeting of intellectual peers . . . brought together to find what is best and true, the Round-Table should first determine the normative principles to guide their further work. . . . Unlike classification, catalogue cannot use a purely artificial international symbolic language.[12]

In specifically taking up international catalog codes, and in view of the groundwork he has already set forth, Ranganathan stated that such matters as normative principle, choice of heading for main entry, etc. ". . . can be bodily adapted by . . . [national] codes . . . [but] . . . an international code on rendering of names and style of writing can only be taken as directives by a [national] code."[13] The Japanese language illustrates why international legislation for detailed punctuation and rendering routines are necessarily bound to failure. Japanese sentences have no punctuation marks. As a result of the impossibility for the Japanese to use ISBD's codes for Japanese language cataloging records going into Japan's catalogs, a JSBD had to be developed.[14] Ranganathan's "Law of Parsimony" is violated when the occurrence of an author's name after the title duplicates the main entry. Ranganathan would have many reasons to find ISBD most objectionable. The IFLA cataloging experts who created ISBD and who have more goodies coming our way should give Ranganathan's Heading and Canons (from which all of these quotes were taken) a most careful reading.

ISBD is a most unfortunate development, probably a precursor of even greater calamities for the users of America's nonresearch libraries, and a perfect example of what Cutter was warning us about. It is ironic that over 70 years later his words could again be timely and even urgent.

The Library of Congress, in the words of William J. Welsh, director of the world's largest processing department, has publicly avowed that "LC's first constituency is in fact the research community."[15] This statement in the proceedings of an Association of Research Libraries (ARL) program, coupled with his American Libraries article (September 1975, p. 459) constitute a mandate for America's public libraries (and to some, all of the nonresearch academic libraries,)[16] to look for an alternative to the LC standard. It is most important to underscore the need for an alternative standard as opposed to an abandonment of standards.

Narrowed options

Options have continuously narrowed through the closings, bankruptcies, and consolidations of commercial and nonprofit processors. Several commercial card and/or processing services have recently gone out of business, and the largest ones remaining are mainly computer based. In the commercial sphere, the H. W. Wilson Company, Richard Abel, Canadian Book Wholesale Company, and most recently Ingram have all gone out of the card business. (Abel and Canadian Book went out of business altogether.) Inflation, the inability to successfully utilize the computer and/or other considerations have resulted in the California State Library processing center (CLASS), the Iowa State Library processing center, and the Colorado Academic Library Book Processing Center (CALBPC) getting out of the processing business. Josten's Catalog Card Corporation, Bro-Dart, and Baker and Taylor, the biggest commercial services, and OCLC and LC's Catalog Distribution Service in the nonprofit sphere, are all providing MARC based cards with the aforementioned defective LC authorities and ISBD conventions. OCLC does give its users the option of changing any portion of the catalog record LC or any member library has entered in the system. Albeit a somewhat time-consuming manual process, it is the positive side of the nonbibliographical control of its data base. None of the commercial services provide this option.

At much greater cost to them, the commercial firms mentioned are also providing title-page entry, Sears headings, and abridged Dewey cataloging to their customers. All of this requires original cataloging for the limited titles they cover, plus input to the computer. It is less and less economical for them to continue to provide alternative cataloging services because they require both professional staff and keyboarders. These people costs are always the most expensive elements in an automated production system.

Further changes in the cataloging rules will of course be incorporated into the MARC record LC distributes to these and other major disseminators of cataloging products. Libraries producing their own cards using the LC unit record (be it a proof slip, NUC record, microform copy of same, etc.) as a master will put all of those "goodies" such as ISBD on every card they make. This means that all of the public, school, and other nonresearch libraries using LC-based cataloging products are getting cataloging data from a "national" library which regards their needs as—at best—its second concern. Consequently ISBD and other superfluous data is showing up in library catalogs all over the country.

Who makes the rules?

One of the chief reasons for ISBD and the previously cited name and topical headings has been the near absence of public library people on the standing ALA bodies which develop and administer cataloging policies and rules. Illustration A will graphically demonstrate the imbalances of representation. An examination of the membership of three key groups within the Resources and Technical Services Division (RTSD) for the 1974-1976 period, and one for the 1975-1976 year, should illustrate the problem. Out of 78 people, 57 are academic librarians, 14 are library school faculty, and four are public library technical services professionals.[17]

This almost total absence of the public library view on RTSD cataloging committees is at least in part the fault of public librarians. At least some, especially administrators, see the catalog as a necessary evil and have literally and figuratively relegated catalogers to the back room, given them the lowest status of their professional staff, and allotted meager funds for their attendance at meetings. Direct service to the public, building buildings, and nodding toward selection have been the foci of many public librarians and it shows in their representation in the ALA structure—they have not had their say in technical services matters because they in significant part have not recognized its importance. This is sad because they are spending money on processing but not really getting full value for it, while others have to pay more than they really should to get reasonable public library cataloging service. For example, the Hennepin County Library has a most vital program, at least as evidenced by its Cataloging Bulletin, of enhancing, correcting, and changing LC cataloging so as to adequately serve its clientele. Unfortunately, Hennepin must bear all of the costs of its improved service because the "national" library output has public libraries as its secondary concern, and the ALA rule-makers are not representative of the interests of public libraries. The academic and library school monopoly of interest, and the lack of participation by public librarians through, in part, their own neglect, leaves us ever more mindful of Cutter's admonition about leaving it to ALA.

Forcing change at LC, CLR

LC staffers, regardless of their personal views, have basically maintained stolid conservative policies in terms of their contributions. Changes in large part, have come as a result of outside criticism and attack: such terms as "Kafirs," "Aeroplanes," "Electronic calculating machines," "Negroes," etc. were eliminated only after external pressure was exerted. This LC intransigence or at best, resistance to change, in combination with CLR appointed and funded bodies, is leading to cataloging policies which will even further disregard public library service, and will probably create some real problems for the academic library user. In its efforts toward national and international standardization, and through the massive input of funds, CLR has been a driving force to establish the ISBD. In other areas CLR has not seemed to be reluctant to establish and fund ad-hoc committees to develop standards which it finds desirable at a given time. It is true that the recommendations of CLR appointed bodies must be approved by the appropriate ALA committee. However the CLR subsidized group meets as frequently as is necessary. The members of ALA groups have no such ready availability of funds, meet twice a year at the ALA annual and midwinter meetings, and in effect have to deal with the almost fait accompli of the CLR committee recommendations in the very short time available.

For example, the Committee on the Encoding of Machine-readable Bibliographic Information (CEMBI) set up by CLR did work which had to be reviewed by the ALA RTSD/ISAD/RASD committee on Representation in Machine-Readable Form of Bibliographic Information (MARBI) for it to become an ALA standard. The problem was that CEMBI was better funded by CLR and could meet as often as necessary, while its ALA counterpart, MARBI, was limited to meeting twice a year. Neither ALA nor the institutions they represented could afford the expense of frequent meetings. If a MARBI member wanted to study a matter in greater depth, the delay would be six months, until the next ALA meeting. That person would then be subject to criticism for delay, obstructionism, holding up national projects, etc. If MARBI rather than CLR's handpicked committee had been funded to originally study the matter, or at least had been kept closely abreast of the CLR group's activities, then that duplicative, time-consuming process might have been avoided, and the MARBI members would have had much better conditions under which to deal with CLR's proposals.

Of gravest concern is the current situation in which the Advisory Group on National Bibliographic Control was established. This group of six people selected by CLR and the National Science Foundation (NSF) has at best two people on it identified with the library community (as opposed to publishing or abstracting and indexing): William Welsh of the Library of Congress, and Jerrold Orne, formerly director of the University of North Carolina library and now head of the University's library school. Orne is a key figure in the area of national library standards with the American National Standards Institute (ANSI). In major part this Group will be following up on a CLR-NSF sponsored meeting (April 17-20, 1974) on "National Bibliographic Control." That meeting had 40 participants, none of whom was identified with a public library. There were six LC people, four were from CLR, six ARL people, and three library school faculty among others. The following general recommendation was made at the meeting:

> The participants join in supporting an effort (by or through [CLR and NSF]) to identify or create an ongoing body . . . that could . . . take appropriate actions to advance social objectives and national needs in the fundamental aspects of bibliographical control including (but not limited to) such activities as developing national strategies, identifying areas for standardization, protecting system integrity, providing national direction for international participation, and assigning responsibility to accomplish specific tasks.[18]

Between the participants and the recently chosen Advisory Group on National Bibliographic Control, the bibliographic needs of the public library community are totally unrepresented. It is of the utmost importance that those who want to see the library catalog be a catalog serving the public libraries, and not just the needs of the international research library cataloging community, actively concern themselves with the confidential work of the Advisory Group's surrogates or working parties before it is writ in stone because, "Working papers . . . will be treated as confidential until such time as it is appropriate to publicize results and invite public comment."[19]

The Library of Congress

LC used to be the premier supplier of card sets in the country. It still is selling more catalog cards than any other supplier in the country, but the nature of its business—the methods of card production, its clientele, its position of unquestioned leadership—has changed.

In the early 1960s, for a variety of reasons, LC's ability to provide a prompt and complete card service declined. In the late 1960s LC tried to create an automated system which would supersede the manual methods of card production and order fulfillment. A primary design goal was to reproduce, in effect by automation, the traditional LC card which had been printed by hot-type and reprinted by photo-offset techniques.[20] The equipment available at that time was a high-speed electronic photocomposition device and the Videocomp, a particular model that was probably the best of its kind. Unlike the computer line printer with its single type font and type size which produces the catalog cards sold by Josten's, Baker & Taylor, OCLC, and a host of other services, the Videocomp, with the capacity for an unlimited number of type fonts and type sizes could be programmed to take a MARC record and produce offset masters for LC cards that are virtually identical to the hot-type cards traditionally printed by LC. In other words, the computer was used to produce the same LC product as before. In addition, another goal was to use automation to furnish the LC card set on demand. LC would stock no cards at all, but would only print the cards needed from its computerized data base when it received the order. This latter goal, according to current LC staff, was unrealistic. The equipment could not be economically utilized to print LC card sets on demand across the full range of card orders, although some individual orders are being fulfilled this way for infrequently requested titles. All of the high volume orders are filled from stocked, or, in effect, preprinted cards.

The Card Division automation project eventually succeeded, although some of its goals changed. The multi-million dollar effort involving the state-of-the-art photocomposition equipment is successfully being used, but LC's card service has subsequently earned less money every year than it did in 1968.[21] (The Card Division, while losing money, also lost its name: it became the Catalog Distribution Service Division.) What accounts for the diminished business, the state-of-the-art equipment notwithstanding? The computer line-printer, vis-à-vis OCLC, Josten's Catalog Card Corporation, Baker & Taylor, Bro-Dart and others, has been able to produce catalog card services in a manner more satisfactory to an increasing number of the nation's libraries than LC. The commercial firms offer kits with headings on appropriate cards and full processing. OCLC mails its card orders out in alphabetical arrangement. Using 20/20 hindsight, it is easy to second-guess about what LC should have done. Maybe a line-printer-based card and/or kit service would have been or still could be a good approach. But it surely would have been challenged by at least some of the library community which requires the highest quality product from LC, but has no qualms about accepting less from others. The automation project did essentially deliver what it was supposed to, but the Catalog Distribution Service Division decreased sales attest to the fact that something else is needed.

LC is still the mecca of card suppliers in the United States, the 60 to 70 million cards sold per year is still unrivaled, but there are fewer libraries turning toward Washington to have their card needs met. The competition, although still not too close, is growing. On the other hand if all of the MARC based cards produced by OCLC, the commercial jobbers, and all of the other MARC subscribers who use MARC to print catalog cards were added to LC's output, LC would probably have an even larger percentage of the card sale market than it did in the Card Division's best years. LC's current position as MARC distributor and low profile card purveyor seems to be the position it wants.

The reason for this extensive examination of the quality of LC's cataloging, its research library commitment, and its comparatively less useful card service, is to provide a background against which to judge the validity of LC's claim that: "The Library of Congress is the logical agency to serve as the national bibliographic center."[22] The national bibliographic center cannot put service to the majority of the nation's population second to the interests of the nation's research libraries and still be considered the national center. LC can be the national bibliographic center for research libraries, but not for the rest of us. Obviously, the nonresearch libraries of the country, certainly the nation's public libraries, need a national bibliographic service, but they must not accept one which subordinates their needs to those libraries on the membership list of the Association of Research Libraries.

Current alternatives

Coupling the developments of the availability of MARC and the viability of the line-printer, commercial processors, and others entered a whole new world of processing. Instead of storing cards for distribution, they can print the requisite card sets or kits as needed for actual orders. In addition through a little extra programming effort, machines could be made to pick out the tracings and overprint them on the appropriate cards, a service not available from LC. The acceptance by the bulk of the nation's libraries of computer line-printer cards was assured when they included fast turnaround, additional services, and low prices.[23]

Automation has kept the purchase of cardsets and processing services economical and timely. Inflation and decreased funding (particularly the withdrawal of large federal subsidies) have driven libraries toward standardization and centralized and/or commercial, but unfortunately flawed, services. In view of the problems with OCLC's data base, including its lack of cross-references, OCLC is not an ideal alternative to LC. OCLC has been and will probably continue to be very successful, despite all of this criticism. Consequently the decline in the observance of traditional cataloging standards as evidenced by the OCLC data base will probably continue. For commercial processors the first priority is profit. It is not easy to get these days. For example, Josten's does not give service on the government documents included in the MARC data base, because it is not economical for them. Another jobber will not take the ISBD punctuation out of the catalog cards it creates from the MARC data base because there has not been a sufficient demand to justify the programming costs involved. None of the commercial services alters the LC catalog record to make it more usable. Josten's, something of an exception, deletes some data elements so it can avoid the cost of printing continuation cards (one of the problems created by the line-printer's single type size), but it does not change the name and topical headings provided in the MARC record. The commercial services do not generally adapt the LC created cataloging they distribute, to meet the needs of their nonresearch library clientele. They have neither the resources to do so, nor the crystal ball to help them divine what would be acceptable and/or desirable to these customers.

The combination of rising local costs and MARC availability have driven many more public, and even school, libraries over to the LC cataloging entry and away from local processors, local practice, and a more local user oriented service. There is a new wave of converts to the unquestioned acceptance of LC cataloging. Only the truly committed and adequately funded libraries can do otherwise. The internal costs are mounting beyond the financial capacities of taxpayers. The net result is that ISBD-like, research library oriented cataloging is becoming more widespread in libraries. Such questionable service should not be imposed on their users. The non-LC based services, Sears, abridged Dewey, title page author, etc., are diminishing, but at least some of the computerized commercial ones seem to be strong.

Several references have already been made to Sears as an alternative to LC for some libraries. Unfortunately the Sears list of subject headings is not an adequate list for most public libraries. There is no central disseminator of cataloging data with Sears terms, only several services, none of which are comprehensive. Sears is neither extensive nor specific enough to serve the broad collection needs of most medium and large public libraries. Finally, there is no updating service for terms covering topics which are introduced between editions. The Sears list is most valuable for small public libraries and school libraries. Some of its choices of terms could be a model for some LC headings which tend to adumbrate rather than enlighten. Sears would not be a satisfactory alternative to LC, but it is clear why it is of value to processors serving school and small public libraries.

Processing for the people?

Things will get worse before they get better, if they get better at all. LC is still producing research library oriented bibliographical information. Sales of its card sets are on the wane. Computerized services outside of LC are having an increasingly dominant impact. Commercial processors whose clients are in both the academic and public sphere are now successfully selling MARC based cataloging services. OCLC has taken a preeminent position with its LC and local MARC records available in card or other forms to its hundreds of members. Many processing centers are still making it, but are subject to increasing economic pressures. Some have failed, others require increased subsidies, and still others are cutting back on services. Dallas Shawkey, chairperson, RTSD Commercial Processing Services (ad hoc) Committee, reports that one state processing center was forced to ask its legislature for a direct subsidy for the 1975-1977 biennium so as to avoid increased prices to its members. Another confided that his center would no longer be selling stand-alone cardsets—its members would have to buy processed books from the center, not just cardsets. The catalog rules will be changed more, consequently the LC catalog record created under them will be affected. These changes will have no useful results for the public library user's efforts to reach desired library materials and may even hinder them. With the increased help of automation and complementary technologies, that catalog record from LC will be placed into more and more catalogs in all formats.

National center for public libraries

There is an alternative: the establishment of a national bibliographic center for public libraries. This service would be concerned with cataloging rules as they relate primarily to the domestic public library user, and only incidentally to international and research library use. Catalog records in any form would then be designed to serve the overwhelming majority of America's library users.

The service would be sensitive to the needs and aspirations of ethnic, age, and sexual minorities. It would care whether a library patron could easily understand the information in the catalog, recognizing "new" terms like "Gospel music" (established by LC in 1975), "Rock music" (established by LC in 1972), and "Rhythm and blues" (still not established by LC) when they come into use rather than decades later. This service would provide full subject access to both adult and juvenile fiction, including "easy" books. The service would have to be computer based, have rigorous authority control, and first-rate professional catalogers who are aware of and in touch with public service concerns, as well as having the appropriate subject and specialty skills. It would have as its first priority the speedy availability of full and accurate cataloging records for current American imprints. While Cataloging In Publication (CIP), an LC service, has been proposed as a solution to this latter need, it has been oversold. CIP is incomplete, often inaccurate—far more so than the final LC record—and leaves individual libraries with the task of producing a physical catalog record.[24] There are still some major publishers not participating in the program. Finding and funding such an outfit in this or any later year of our Ford might just be a soma trip, but it would be far better than forcing the majority of library users to struggle with the esoterica and unreality of research library cataloging data.

Because LC has been so remote from the needs of most of the nation's library users, and has usually responded with resistance or palliative, it would take a massive effort for LC to adjust to serve them. The only alternative is a consortium of public libraries, supported at the outset almost wholly by grant monies. If a national bibliographic center for public libraries could be established which would meet all of the requirements set forth and serve public libraries with the same intensity of effort LC serves research libraries, public libraries would be far better served than they are at present. Commercial processors, presently saddled with the costly options and original cataloging they must provide the non-LC based libraries, would welcome a standardized machine-readable cataloging record and/or a standardized format for products which they in turn could sell to all libraries. ALA cataloging committees concern themselves almost solely with international, nay universal, bibliographical control. Achieving a standard for U.S. library users will take either special perseverance or a different route altogether. Centralized processors, would better serve their customers by dealing with a bibliographic center established primarily to serve them rather than a different constituency.

People's MARC

The goal in effect is a PEOPLE'S/MARC. MARC, the computer communications format for cataloging data, is a remarkably flexible computer format—it is neutral. It solely concerns itself with how cataloging information is to be organized in machine terms, but does not dictate what the content of the catalog record is to be. Simply put, MARC can be used as the communications format for the cataloging produced from a national bibliographic center for public libraries, a People's MARC. Regardless of what agency, be it a rededicated LC, a consortium of public libraries, or some other alternative, a People's MARC from a national bibliographic center for public libraries is essential.

Those who care about the quality of the catalog as a public service tool essential to meeting and being responsive to the library needs of contemporary Americans must intensify their efforts to be heard, understood, and effective. The catalog must be a useable, responsive and vital tool. The alternative to such vigorous action is the complacent acceptance of the currently available and deficient options apparently accepted by the Cleveland Public Library, now in the process of converting from the Dewey to the LC classification scheme and joining OCLC. The Cleveland administration said that when all of this is accomplished, ". . . the library can get rid of its entire cataloging staff."[25]

How much would you pay to get the King off your back?

We were young. On our own. And fighting George the Third.

And to win our War of Independence, it took every available man and more money than we had.

So we passed the hat. And investors thought we looked promising enough to kick in over 27 million dollars.

Today, the King is dead. But long live those financial worries.

What better way to handle them than through United States Savings Bonds? You're helping the country with its finances. You're helping yourself with yours.

Join in America's Bicentennial Celebration. Buy the specially designed Bicentennial Series E Bonds where you work or bank.

They're the same, safe, dependable E Bonds with a historical face-lift.

You're taking stock in America. And you'll keep those financial worries off your back.

Now E Bonds pay 6% interest when held to maturity of 5 years (4½% the first year). Lost, stolen or destroyed Bonds can be replaced if records are provided. When needed, Bonds can be cashed at your bank. Interest is not subject to state or local income taxes, and federal tax may be deferred until redemption.

Take stock in America.

200 years at the same location.

Why should you worry about book-stealing when your sharp-eyed student checkers are on duty?

If you're hiring student checkers because it provides extra income for some needy students, that's fine. But if you're doing it because you sincerely think it'll eliminate book thefts, you're kidding yourself.

When there's a continuous stream of people coming and going, the checkers can't possibly check everyone's briefcase. And when the traffic is slow, the checker is tempted to use the time to catch up on his studying.

The point is, even if you had the world's most conscientious checkers, unless they physically frisk everyone leaving the library, you will continue to lose books.

And that's where Tattle-Tape® comes in.

Tattle-Tape Book Detection Systems electronically "frisk" everyone who walks through the checkout area. The system is designed so that any treated book will signal the alarm, no matter where it is hidden. Or, "forgotten."

And your Tattle-Tape system will never spend its time sipping pop, reading, or goofing off. It just sits there, eternally vigilant, unafraid to ring the alarm on anyone, whether lowly Freshman or lofty Ph.D.

And that's why libraries all across the country are switching to Tattle-Tape book detection systems. They report cutting book losses by up to 90%. And that means you can spend money buying new books instead of constantly replacing stolen books.

Want to learn more? We'll give you all the information you need. Just write on your letterhead to 3M Detection Systems, Building 220-9E, 3M Center, St. Paul, Mn. 55101. If possible, tell us roughly how many books you have in your facility.

If you're going to hire someone to do a job with impersonal efficiency, the way to do it is to hire a machine.

Tattle-Tape. So you can run a lending library. Instead of a stealing library.

LIBRARY NETWORKS

by John Corbin

LIBRARIES are beset with an abundance of chronic problems, among them being their inabilities, as individual institutions, to acquire, organize, store, and access the totality of an expanding and increasingly complex information base. Rising costs, insufficient funding, inadequate storage space, and a myriad of other reasons have convinced most librarians of their limitations to operate completely self-contained and self-sufficient libraries capable of filling all the needs of mobile, diverse user groups expecting efficient services and fast access to information and materials.

While most of the information needs of library users probably can be filled from local collections, there are times when limited resources must be supplemented by borrowing from other libraries. Also, new or improved services which individual libraries acting alone are reluctant or incapable of offering often can be initiated through cooperation with other libraries; and, by pooling resources, efforts, and work into larger bases, there are possibilities for a stabilization or reduction of operating costs of individual libraries.

The best mechanisms or vehicles for these cooperative efforts appear to be organizations of independent, autonomous libraries into cooperatives called systems, federations, or consortia. When materials, information, and services are exchanged between or distributed to members of these groups over transportation or communication links, networks are formed.

Growth of library networks

Library networks have been evolving slowly in this country since the turn of the century and even before. The trend has quickened in the past ten years, due to the influx of federal funds, worsening economic conditions causing reductions in library acquisitions and in other services, and a corresponding need to stretch funds further, and certainly the dazzling and impressive success of the Ohio College Library Center.

Generally, networks have evolved along type-of-library lines in an overlapping, uneven, and random process.[1] Where innovative individuals have been available to identify needs and recommend courses of action, where major institutions have lent leadership support, and where grant funds have been available for initiation of projects, cooperation leading to networks seems to have developed more rapidly than in areas where these factors are missing.[2]

Public library networks, which began with the development of local, county, and multicounty cooperative systems and federations, have been fostered for decades by state library agencies and aided by state aid and funds from the federal Library Services and Construction Act. During the zenith years of this act, an emphasis was placed on the development of systems and networks. Today, most states have statewide networks serving public libraries or at least the skeletons of such networks in various stages of development. Some states such as Illinois and New York have experimented with mixtures of libraries of different types as network members.

Academic and special library consortia such as the Five Associated University Libraries (FAUL), New England Library Information Network (NELINET), the Regional Library Group (RLG), the Ohio College Library Center (OCLC), and others have been formed among public-supported libraries within states and regions out of needs for general cooperation and for the common development of specific projects, including networks, which have benefitted all members. Some, such as the Amigos Bibliographic Council (ABC), Southeastern Library Network (SOLINET), Pennsylvania Area Library Network (PALINET), and others were established only recently primarily to meet requirements for participation in the OCLC network. One of the most successful library networks is MEDLINE, developed by the National Library of Medicine and distributed through a number of regional medical programs which serve the entire country and some parts of Europe. Few academic libraries in this country currently do not belong to at least one cooperative or consortia. Some of these networks have small numbers of public, school, and state libraries participating as members.

School libraries have been slow to organize networks. They have invested most of their local funds, state aid, and funds from the federal Elementary and Secondary Education Act in equipment and materials to develop self-contained, self-sufficient libraries. However, many states have developed regional centers where many activities such as media production, processing, storage, and other services have been centralized for distribution to local school libraries as needed.

Common programs undertaken by these various cooperatives and networks generally are divided between activities involving direct exchange or transfer of physical materials between participating network nodes (such as interlibrary loans, photocopying services, reciprocal borrowing agreements, reference referrals, courier services, film circuits, etc.), activities supporting the sharing of physical materials (union catalogs and lists of the holdings of member libraries, cooperative development of resources, cooperative storage, public relations, etc.), and activities involving processing of information and materials for use and other internal operations within individual libraries (shared cataloging, centralized processing, etc.).

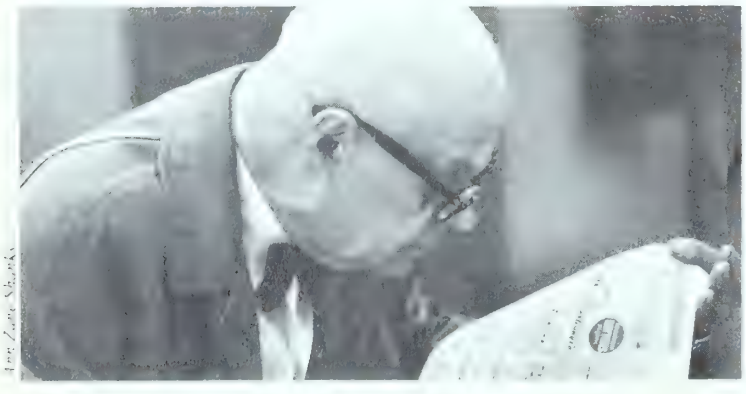
The number of library cooperatives and networks in this country will continue to proliferate in the future, particularly among large research libraries of all types. The participation of smaller libraries in networking will be more gradual. The "typical" library network participant of the era 1995-2015 will physically or outwardly seem unchanged from today. Its collection still will be composed mainly of books and documents, and its reading rooms will remain as havens of solitude, study, and social contacts. Missing will be visible evidence of the indexes and catalogs to its collections, many ready reference books, and most technical services operations.

The indexes and catalogs to the library's own collections will be machine-stored and tucked away in a closet or blocks or miles away in some central computer. Access to the indexes will be by visual display terminals scattered around the library, in other public buildings, and in some private dwellings. Users will be able to search the indexes thoroughly and easily, through controlling computers. The same terminals can be used, on a more limited basis due probably to incomplete development and insufficient funds even in this era, to locate and retrieve some textual materials (short facts of a ready reference nature). Files of general bibliographic citations and abstracts located in national and regional data banks will also be available routinely, through the same terminals. The library's technical services will be limited to small staffs for ordering, receiving, and physical processing. Data required in these functions will be centralized into one or more national or regional centers and distributed to the library through computer terminals. One or more minicomputers will be used to control and coordinate the various activities located within and without the library.

The library will interface or connect with different



"Local libraries will serve primarily as public service outlets . . . Increasing emphasis will be on face-to-face services to users . . ."

networks at different times to obtain different services. It might be "plugged" permanently into a small number of networks, such as those for general interlibrary loans and technical services, but into a variety of others for specialized data bases and location of esoteric or little-used materials only as needed. The library will serve primarily as an outlet for face-to-face public services and as a switching center or broker between users and information located near or far away.

If this is an accurate picture of "typical" libraries of the future 20-40 years from now, are they now heading in this direction? If not, what must be done to alter courses of action to assure these future conditions?

Consolidating networks

The historical development of library cooperatives and networks along provincial and type-of-library lines is causing a duplication and overlapping which must be reduced and minimized in the future. The need for separate networks for public, academic, special, and school libraries (and often, separate networks for gradations of sizes or for libraries of differing funding support within these groups) is questionable.

While it is true certainly that the needs of users of the various types of libraries are different, it is debatable whether separate networks in specific geographic areas are necessary to serve these needs. An interlibrary loan request, whether for a kindergarten reader, a gardening book, a technical report, a government document, or a film, contains essentially the same types of information which could be transmitted over the same network, though the messages would be routed or switched to certain sizes and types of libraries within the network; one courier service could deliver materials to all types of libraries in an area; and information, regardless of the level or type of material, can be stored in a common data base for distribution over the same network (the MARC formats assure this).

A consolidation of local networks seems essential to maximize the scarce money resources available to individual libraries; it seems to be a squandering of funds to develop and operate "separate but equal" networks just because support funds originate from different bases such as local property taxes, private gifts, state appropriations, federal aid, and so on. A consolidation could provide a larger economic base for support of these networks and their services, better coordination of efforts, a wider sharing of resources, and more cost benefits to the citizens who ultimately must pay for library and information services.

New organizational patterns will be increasingly necessary in the future to assure the success of library networks. These new patterns should take the form of singular consortia encompassing library members of all types and levels. Such consortia will enable the work to be done while assuring the independence and autonomy of individual libraries. No organization which does not recognize local differences, individualism, and community pride has much chance of success in the foreseeable future.

In most cases, new laws will not be needed to form new and different organizations. The governing bodies of most libraries already have the power to cooperate and contact with other legal bodies such as consortia, through general permissive legislation, traditions, rulings of courts, interstate compacts, and so on. What will be needed more will be attitudinal changes of community leaders, officials, and librarians from thinking in terms of opposing "we" and "them" camps into organizations which will serve the best interests of all citizens.

What is needed are singular network structures connecting all libraries in specific geographic areas such as counties, multicounties, or states. Once a singular, standardized network structure is established in specific geographic areas, then an unlimited number of differing, competing services of all kinds and levels could be channelled through the network as required by its participating members. There would be no reason why commercial firms, under general supervision of advisory or supervisory boards of librarians, could not operate these networks, thus assuring a role to the private sector. Contracts could be made on the basis of competitive bids for blocks of years, renewable if quality performance is maintained.

Networks operated in specific geographic areas must be able to connect or interface efficiently and effectively with those in all other areas of the country. A national plan, standards, coordination, and leadership are essential to this end.

Need for a national plan

Before standards are set and before the country is saturated with incompatible and competing networks, an overall, national plan must be developed. So far, the National Commission on Libraries and Information Science (NCLIS) has proposed only broad guidelines or criteria for development of a national network; a specific design has not yet been presented. Until at least a skeletal plan for networking on the national level is prepared and accepted by the various disciplines involved, it is foolish to expect intelligent planning and coordination to proceed in a coordinated manner on the regional, state, and local levels.

". . . emphasis in the future will be on services involving bibliographic data . . . relatively easy and economical to . . . transfer from one library to another . . ."

There is a question whether an agency of the federal government such as NCLIS can provide adequate and sustained leadership and coordination for a nationwide network.[3] Such a lack certainly has reduced the effectiveness of LSCA programs in the past. On the other hand, only an agency (private or governmental) with legal and monetary power on a national basis will be able to focus planning on the scale required for a national network. The problems associated with devising a plan which will be acceptable to both library and information industry representatives seem insurmountable. Solutions to the problems would seem easier to obtain if the structure of the network were separated (but not isolated from) the services to be exchanged or distributed over the national network. Programs based solidly on the needs of individual citizens for equal access to informational services, rather than on vested interests of any one library, business, or pressure group must be assured.

Need for standards

Standards for network philosophy, organization, governance, management, operation, and finance are needed to ensure their future development, coordination, and quality. Technical standards for computer and communications equipment, software, and data base design are essential to compatability of networks and their services.

Divisions of the American Library Association traditionally have set standards for libraries in this country, but no unit of that organization currently exists which could effectively tackle networking standards, particularly if these standards must be (and they must) for networks and services for all types and levels of libraries. The National Commission on Libraries and Information Science could provide the basis for the formation of networking standards; it already has identified this as a major federal responsibility.[4] Representatives from such organizations as the American Library Association, the American Society for Information Science, and the Information Industry Association must be involved in the development of the standards.

Once standards are set and accepted by the American National Standards Institute (ANSI), libraries must insist that any service offered on a network follow these standards. This implies also that mechanisms be established for enforcing the standards.

Need for research

Network research is vital; experimentation should and must be encouraged. But if funding for research and development is made to design totally separate and competing network systems which accomplish essentially the same results, the efforts seem to be wasteful. Unfortunately, it is nearly impossible to design, develop, and test library systems without actually implementing them in the process. The only effective way of comparing alternative systems is to fund their research and development in differing situations in different libraries. If this is true, then what is greatly needed are acceptable standards upon which to judge the results of research and development itself. As it is now, it is also impossible to perform comparative evaluations of alternative systems such as OCLC, BALLOTS, BIBNET, the Washington State Library system, and others. The problem again points to a need for a national network design, national standards, coordination, and leadership.

More systematic studies are needed to determine if such services as borrower registration, circulation, serials check-in, purchase order writing, fund accounting, and other functions involving internal operations of individual libraries are desirable networking activities. Obviously, circulation charges and discharges, for example, must originate locally; but, the unanswered question is whether it is necessary to maintain the circulation files in local computer storage or whether the same purposes could be achieved if they are housed and maintained, along with the circulation files of other libraries, in computer storage tens or thousands of miles away. The advantages of having software for circulation systems systematically and centrally developed are tremendous; of having programs run on a day-to-day basis centrally through a network rather than in a decentralized mode are not so obvious.

Future service patterns

The success of any library network will hinge on its ability to provide viable services which are desirable and cost-beneficial to potential users. In the past, networking efforts have concentrated on the identification and location of information and materials in specific libraries through such devices as union catalogs and on requesting and delivering information and materials, once located in specific libraries, through interlibrary loans, reciprocal borrowing, courier services, and photocopying. These will continue to be the foundation of cooperation and networking activities in the future, but more emphasis will be upon the use of computers and communications technology to facilitate the services.

". . . before the country is saturated with incompatible and competing networks, an overall, national plan must be developed"

Greater emphasis in the future will be on services involving bibliographic data, citations, abstracts, and other related information about materials, rather than physical materials themselves. This bibliographic, citation, and abstract information is relatively easy and economical to store, retrieve, and transfer from one library to another because it is short and can be compactly structured. It is likely that the information will be machine-stored in a number of national or regional centers and distributed, under control of computers and coupled with data communications facilities, to local libraries. On the local level, data retrieved from the remote data bases will be used to identify and locate items bibliographically and in specific collections and to aid in the processing of materials for libraries' collections. It appears that OCLC will become a prototype or model for future networks—not necessarily for specific services, but for the methods or techniques by which the services are distributed. OCLC, despite its real or imagined disadvantages, has shown librarians that such a venture is indeed possible and at prices which are very close to those of manual systems. Certainly, libraries are able to make materials available to users much faster than ever before.

Future delivery or transfer of materials from one library to another will be primarily by conventional methods, as in the past, even though there has been a deterioration of mail delivery services and increases in their costs and increases in gasoline, wage, and equipment costs for courier deliveries. Technically, the electronic transfer of full textual copies of materials longer than bibliographic data, citations, abstracts, short ready-reference facts, and other similar data is possible but does not seem to be too desirable economically, except in unusual circumstances when costs are not of concern or when speed is essential. More and more materials are available in microform, and the trend will continue. But these materials are not inexpensive and usually are exempt from interlibrary lending in most cases. While copies can be made easily and cheaply, problems with copyright will prevent extensive duplication for networking purposes.

With the exception of interlibrary loans and other services which can be offered at little or no expense by conventional methods, the more sophisticated and expensive networking activities will continue to be out of reach of small and inadequately funded libraries of all types without state and federal subsidies on a continuing basis. These libraries need to share resources and services the most, but when they have to struggle merely to exist from year to year, very little effort can be expended on networking, however desirable it might be. Libraries in metropolitan areas can and will consolidate or join with others to gain access to needed networking services, but rural libraries will not have the same opportunities. Local libraries, of which the majority are small and inadequately funded, are expected to form the foundation of the future national network.[5]

Copyright will continue to be a problem in the future, though some solutions hopefully will be implemented within the next ten years. The chances appear good that librarians or users will pay small fees to publishers whenever information and materials are copied for transmittal over networks, though not when physical items themselves are lent without copying. There seems to be no question that general bibliographic information, citations, and abstracts are not copyrightable, which will provide further impetus to an emphasis upon these resources becoming the main networking commodity in the future.

Face-to-face service

Library networks of all types have good growth potential in the next 20-40 years, but not without many problems. Unless a national plan which will provide for an orderly growth is proposed soon, the quickening proliferation of networks will result in chaotic development nationally and locally. This situation will delay the development of a good national program further. Standards also are needed to provide compatibility among network elements on all levels. Inadequate funding, the copyright problem, and a lack of coordinated leadership on all levels will be problems for years to come.

The primary emphasis in network services during the next 20-40 years will involve bibliographic data and other related information, rather than on physical items themselves. Dependence on computers and other highly sophisticated technology will increase. The use of in-house minicomputers for internal operations and for handling networking activities will increase.

Local libraries will serve primarily as public service outlets, with most technical services being performed centrally elsewhere and distributed to libraries as needed. Increasing emphasis will be on face-to-face services to users, which should have been the primary concern of librarians all the time.

You oughta be in pictures and here's how to do it . . .

Art lending collections have become one of the most popular services in the library's expanded role of community service. The New York Graphic Society has provided fine art prints and framed reproductions to more than 1000 libraries across the country for nearly its entire fifty years of publishing.

Whether your library has a lending collection or not, this Fiftieth Anniversary edition of the New York Graphic Society Fine Art Reproductions Catalog is essential . . . a valuable art reference book as well as the basic source, presenting the entire range of man's richest art achievements – from the temple paintings of ancient Egypt to the fresh talents of contemporary America, with page after page of new pictures, including a prestigious Americana collection for the Bicentennial.

This 584 page, cloth-bound book offers you:

☐ The world's largest collection of fine art reproductions, with nearly 2000 large full-color illustrations.

☐ Ready reference . . . with each entry citing artist, nationality and dates, title, museum or collection, order number and price as well as suggested framing styles. In addition, there is an expanded classified index, special interest table of contents and numerical index.

☐ Biographies of more than 350 artists.

☐ A special illustrated Framing Guide. With it, you can order the prints you want custom framed in one of 18 handsome, durable styles —ready for lending.

☐ Plus photographs, limited edition graphics, Alva Museum Sculpture and Jewelry.

Your purchase price is $25. net postpaid, but it can be yours free — if you've bought $250. net in framed prints in the last year. Or if you buy that much in the next twelve months,notify us and we'll credit your account.

Organizing Librarians:

three options for ALA

I met with several kinds of associations in America of which I confess I had no previous notion; and I have often admired the extreme skill with which the inhabitants of the United States succeed in proposing a common object for the exertions of a great many men and in inducing them voluntarily to pursue it.—Alexis de Tocqueville

by Robert Wedgeworth

THE CHARACTERISTICS which have defined the American Library Association from its inception are at the heart of the most controversial and complex issue which ALA will have to face as it launches its second century. Namely, how will ALA promote the interests of its library employee members?

Since that sixth day of October 1876 when 103 men and women agreed to create the American Library Association, its basic purpose has never changed. That purpose has been the promotion of libraries and librarianship to assure the delivery of user-oriented library and information services to all. Chartered in Massachusetts, but moved to Chicago in 1909, ALA is a nonprofit educational association whose membership consists of individuals as well as organizations.

Contrary to popular belief, the Association has never possessed those unique qualities which characterize the professional association, trade association, or business league. For example, the Association's membership, unlike a professional association, is absolutely unrestricted by any qualification other than a commitment to the improvement of libraries and library service. This contrasts sharply with bar associations whose membership is confined to lawyers; with medical societies whose membership is restricted to doctors; and with innumerable other membership restrictions of other professional and trade associations and business leagues.

In addition, the Association has never served as a representative of its library employee members in their negotiations concerning compensation, benefits, or working conditions.

Collective bargaining

The final report of the Activities Committee on New Directions (ACONDA) adopted by the ALA in 1971 reflected many concerns for the library employee members of the Association. However, even this report, considered controversial by many, did not focus on the underlying issue related to the welfare of library employees. In the intervening years each of the major groups of library employees—academic librarians, public librarians, and school library media specialists—have come to recognize that for many of them formal negotiation of the terms and conditions under which they will provide their services is inevitable. While the number of library employees involved in some type of collective bargaining remains low it is likely to increase dramatically within the next decade. A number of environmental factors are likely to influence this development.

Libraries have become larger and more complex organizations requiring more specialized management skills and techniques to administer. They have extended their resources and services through cooperative arrangements in order to provide users with more services in greater depth. In doing so they have developed a more formal, more impersonal management style.

Libraries regularly employ more technology in providing service to users than was even in existence as late as 30 years ago. Included in this would be micrographics, computer technology, and the various audio and video communications media. In many instances new procedures based on the new technology have eliminated certain positions while creating others. The new positions have required personnel with specialized training acquired in formal educational programs or on the job, but in either case contributing to a rise in expectations which in many cases has not been realized.

Libraries have also experienced, along with the general economy, a stabilization or decrease in financial support in the face of persistent inflation. The consequence has been the stabilization or reduction of personnel while the amount and complexity of the tasks assigned to them have continued to increase. In general, the confluence of these developments has stimulated the search for a library employee advocate, and under certain circumstances has led directly to efforts to organize for collective bargaining purposes.

ALA's dilemma—three options

Though it has been decidedly neutral in its policies and practices, ALA is no stranger to the issue of collective bargaining. In response to the question of whether library employees should organize for collective bargaining purposes, ALA adopted in 1970 a policy which simply recognized collective bargaining as one of several methods of conducting labor-management relations. At the time, this posture was consistent with ALA's neutral position and highlighted the lack of any clear patterns in library labor relations as well as the lack of enabling legislation which would permit public employees to engage in collective bargaining in many states.

As more library employees from the various types of institutions become involved in collective bargaining units the question no longer will be whether they should, but under the auspices of what organization should it take place.

Simply stated, the dilemma for ALA is what role the Association will take in the grass roots organization of the library profession. In my opinion, there are at least three major alternatives.

First, the American Library Association can choose to pursue its broadly construed educational role, but narrow the focus of its activities in support of library institutional interests. ALA, under such circumstances, might develop similarly to the Association of Research Libraries. While this does not mean that ALA would lack interest in the well being of library employees as individuals, it would not move directly to deal with employee issues except as they are defined in terms of the institutional interest. A corollary to this course of action would be to discontinue personal membership in the Association.

Secondly, the American Library Association can choose to modify its legal organizational status so as to become a professional association and thereby directly involve itself in representing the interests of library employees by whatever means may be appropriate. Although the focus of its activities would be the personal welfare of library employees including compensation, working conditions, tenure, status and due process, there would be some residual concern for libraries as institutions.

A third major alternative would be for the American Library Association to choose to move more aggressively to provide support activities at the national, state, and local level for library employees regardless of their affiliations, whether they are members of local professional associations, unions, or other groupings. At the same time, ALA would continue to provide support activities for libraries as institutions. Although this alternative would not require any modification of the legal organizational status of the Association it would require the return to some program objectives which characterized ALA prior to 1950. These would include a greater focus on library employee compensation, employment opportunities, and education.

It may be suggested that there is always the alternative of doing nothing. In the case presented here, not to face the issue of specific programming in support of library employees is to decide by default that ALA should pursue a program of activities aimed, primarily, at libraries. Since it is safe to say that the first alternative is most likely to occur as a consequence of no decision or as a reaction to a choice of the second alternative, the analysis will concentrate on alternatives two and three.

ALA as bargaining agent

Should the American Library Association choose to modify itself in order to pursue directly the representation of library employees, including to engage in collective bargaining, there are several models that it may choose to emulate. Some years ago the American Nurses Association (ANA) moved decisively to educate its state affiliates to serve as collective bargaining agents for its local members. This has enabled ANA to broaden its base for influencing change in hospitals by ANA's participation in the development of professional standards for nurses while providing direct support in the form of funds and staff to assist in determining the terms and conditions under which nurses will work. More recently, the National Education Association (NEA) became an organization for classroom teachers in response to the threat of a rival organization. With a total membership of 1.2 million members, NEA has a powerful membership base from which to promote the welfare of teachers through collective bargaining as well as other means. As of this writing the American Medical Association has announced that it endorses collective bargaining for its member physicians in order to strengthen them in dealing with hospitals as well as local, state, and governmental authorities.

Compared to these fields, librarianship is a small universe, composed of several small populations—employees of school libraries, academic libraries, and public libraries. What success ALA has been able to achieve can be attributed, in part, to overcoming the disadvantage of small size by representing a coalition of the institutional, professional, and public interest in library service.

Each of the constituent employee populations in the library field tends to be a subordinate professional group within their respective institutions—schools, colleges. Therefore, it is no surprise that most of the experience in organizing library employees has been with organizations such as the American Association of University Professors, National Education Association, American Federation of Teachers, and the American Federation of State, County and Municipal Employees.

To organize small groups of library employees scattered across the country, many of whom are already affiliated with the dominant professional group within their institution would be exceptionally costly in dollars as well as staff. In addition, library professionals would need to be separated from other library employees if they had supervisory responsibilities, according to current National Labor Relations Board opinion.

Fiscal implications

The fiscal implications of these kinds of activities on ALA should not be taken lightly. The major financial consequence of ALA becoming directly involved in collective bargaining and other direct respresentations of its library employee members would not be the additional cost of field operations, but the income loss resulting from having to assume a different level of tax exemption. Tax exemption itself is basically the privilege of enjoying a government subsidy for activities that benefit the general welfare of the country. The benefits of a tax-exempt organization cannot accrue to the benefit of individual members, be they persons or institutions. The current financial structure of ALA assumes the educational tax exemption. It was pointed out at the 1974 Annual Conference in New York that for 1974-75 a loss of ALA's tax-exempt status would eliminate access to approximately $250,000 in endowment funds and $1.25 million in outside funded projects.

The essential point here is not that ALA cannot or should not engage in activities which may tend to threaten its tax-exempt status, but that such decisions should be pursued with a clear understanding of the potential consequences.

The third option

In comparing the second and third alternatives, it seems obvious that the potential costs for ALA to attempt to directly represent its library employee members with respect to compensation and working conditions greatly exceed the potential benefits. For ALA to choose to maintain its present organizational status not only has fiscal advantages, it also allows the Association to maintain the coalition of library interests which has its major source of influence at the national level.

Apart from the fiscal implications, a key requirement of both alternative directions would be a stronger articulation between the national association and its state chapters. The relationship between state and regional associations and the national association must be specifically defined.

In order to shape the ALA program to meet the needs of its personal members, the Association must move decisively in several major program areas. The activities must be of obvious benefit to personal members. Some examples for consideration are:

1) Exert greater control over the library employment market, perhaps through certification.

2) Initiate regular statistical compilations of salary and other data.

3) Redefine chapter status in order to resolve the present ambiguity regarding its benefits and obligations as well as how they are created.

4) Develop educational programs including topics such as collective bargaining techniques which can be presented under ALA chapter sponsorship.

5) Develop a program of membership growth through ALA chapters with appropriate incentives to chapters to increase their ALA membership.

These few suggestions are not likely to revitalize the ALA program by themselves. However, they may lend more credence to de Tocqueville's observations on the American skill in reaching a consensus of objectives and acting upon it.

The Science Report on Cancer Research

Seeds of Destruction

Thomas H. Maugh II and Jean L. Marx
American Association for the Advancement of Science

Now, from the pages of Science comes a report on what is really occurring in cancer research. Two investigative reporters, Tom Maugh and Jean Marx, found out from the experts what they think and what they're doing. And it's all down in language easily understood by nonprofessionals. With candor, they convey what cancer is; what causes it—chemicals, isolated viruses, a tumor; and take a probing look at the disease itself, analyzing how it kills and maims. The reader tours with the authors through laboratories here and abroad discovering past trends and what's happening right now. In exciting detail, all the fascinating paths taken by scientists to determine how chemicals interact with cells, whether the body can create its own defense against cancer, and how doctors are trying new ways of treating cancer patients—all this and more is found in this impressive account. This major book club selection includes an extensive glossary of terms most frequently encountered in discussing cancer. $17.95

The U.S. in World Librarianship

by Norman Horrocks

INTERNATIONAL library cooperation is assuming much greater importance to librarians in all parts of the world and is likely to be a major concern in the next quarter of a century. While in the past we have thought of such things as international agreements for interlibrary loans, cooperative agreements between nations in the provision of abstracting services, the services of visiting consultants, pilot projects for public library service or assistance with the development of library schools, the future will be more technically sophisticated with the sharing of computer software and the use of advanced communications networks linked with computerized retrieval systems.

The foreseeable future still includes countries in which library service will be at the "pilot project" level, or a little above it. This will be the challenge to the more highly developed library nations. Paul Gerin-Lajoie, head of the Canadian International Development Agency, speaking recently to the Vienna Institute for Development, an international group of political decision-makers, academics, and public servants, put it thus: "International development can no longer be regarded as a plea from the poor. It is a challenge to the collective conscience of mankind to establish a new social order in which people of all nations, rich and poor alike, can together shape their common destiny. It is at best a moral imperative; but it is also a practical possibility."

What are the practical international possibilities for librarianship? All the examples of international cooperation in past library history are well documented in the literature, and it is clear that not all issues and problems have yet been resolved, e.g. copyright. In the international library literature, there is a veritable alphabet soup of organizations (Unesco, IFLA, UNISIST, UBC) whose programs are being described and discussed. There has been a rise in the number of specialist international library agencies and their activities, with INTAMEL, IASL, IFIP, and COMLA as examples. Part of this interest has been fuelled by library schools with their courses on international and/or comparative librarianship. Ironically this growth in interest in the United States has come at a time when the number of foreign students attending U.S. library schools has declined. This article will not catalog all of these current activities, although some of the more significant will be mentioned below. A little recent history, however, linking this to today's activities, both actual and proposed, will help this attempt to describe some of the likely implications for the future of world librarianship.

The international scene

The end of World War II forms a convenient and significant point in time at which to begin. The former League of Nations—which itself had been responsible for many areas of international cooperation—had been replaced by the United Nations, with one of its specialized agencies being Unesco. Unesco's post-war programs reflected the concerns of those early post-war years: the restocking of war-damaged libraries, the encouragement for the creation of national bibliographic centers, pilot projects demonstrating different aspects of library service in many parts of the world where these did not exist, support for library education programs so that trained personnel would be available to work in and plan for library development, the strengthening of local publishing and book industries, and others. The overall objective was to help countries help themselves, although inevitably the richer, more developed nations contributed the most in money, materials, and personnel.

The United States was a major contributor to all of these activities and many others. The January 1972 issue of Library Trends, devoted to "The Influence of American Librarianship Abroad," gives a useful overview of post-World War II activities to that date. This issue makes it clear that not all U.S. participation in international library cooperation was funnelled through Unesco. There were other significant programs in their own right, such as the USIA, the overseas programs of the Library of Congress, and the international activities of the American Library Association itself.

Important as these library-related programs were, whether part of Unesco or operating independently, they have to be placed in their wider context. They occurred in a significantly changing atmosphere within the United States itself. World War II had convinced the United States that it needed to be self-sufficient in having information available for its scholars and research workers.

"The continually growing mass of material to be organized and the inexorable demands of the computer for uniformity seem certain to ensure that the long hope for universal approach to recording information will be achieved"

The Farmington Plan is the best known library manifestation of this. There was also recognition that Europe could no longer be relied upon to provide a major proportion of the world's basic scientific knowledge. The U.S. Air Force airlifted massive collections of captured German, Italian, and later Japanese documents back to the United States. The Air Force then organized a program to make them available to U.S. industry. At the same time, a mass of U.S. documents, hitherto secret, were also released through the same channels. The 1950s and 1960s were periods of great intensity in the development of information retrieval systems which could lead to the exploitation of knowledge for peace-time development and growth.

Although this was peace-time, it was also a period of the "cold war." This and the 1957 Sputnik launching by the Russians caused major re-assessments of the U.S. information handling activities. The tremendous Federal Government support for research and development programs which—sometimes very tangentially—could be linked to the "space race" or the "cold war" is well documented. All too clearly, this has now changed. The last manned space flight was a joint venture between the U.S. and the U.S.S.R. and an example of international cooperation which would have been deemed impossible not too many years ago. Ironically this mission aroused very little enthusiasm in the American people, or indeed in other countries outside the U.S.S.R. itself. For a large portion of the world's people, including those in the United States, the control of the world's population seems more important than control of world communism. The concerns of outer space seem an expensive irrelevancy to many who are confronted with questions affecting the environment and the quality of life on earth.

Centralization or not?

The United States has not been alone in determining its priorities in relating information handling to economic development. Despite the post-World War II involvement of the Federal Government, mentioned above, the U.S. still relies heavily on a number of agencies. Traditionally these have been learned societies and professional bodies although in recent years a number of commercial firms have become more involved in handling information for profit. In other countries there has been a much higher degree of centralization. The Soviet Union's VINITI has been the model for many countries, not all of them in the East European bloc. Canada has developed its CISTI, Australia is developing STISEC, and Britain has recently reorganized its whole national library system. Although not yet as completely centralized as the Russians in the handling of information, the nations just named have decided that reliance on cooperation between the public and private sectors is no longer sufficient. The central governments of these countries are not setting policy for the librarians to implement. The U.S. has its record of Presidential Advisors, the National Academy of Sciences, the national libraries themselves, and many other bodies all contributing to library and information activities. The National Commission on Libraries and Information Science with its concern for a nationwide integrated service could well become the unifying force in this country.

Compatability and standards

These developments are not taking place in a vacuum nor are they restricted to the more highly developed countries in the world. Unesco is encouraging its member nations to develop national information systems (NATIS). The first issue of NATIS NEWS points out that although all nations will develop a system to respond to their individual needs there must be involvement of all three levels of government, local, state or provincial, and central. Plus, all nations must plan in an international context based on the twin principles of compatability and standardization. This same issue goes on to describe recent developments in Venezuela and Brazil where the central governments have decreed the formation of national information systems.

How is this "compatability and standardization" to be provided? Already we can see some examples at work. The Universal Bibliographic Control (UBC) office of the International Federation of Library Associations (IFLA) is active in seeking to establish that, once and for all, cataloging takes place in the country producing the book. Making this information available, preferably in machine readable form, together with the production of national bibliographies is also foreseen by UBC, as is the making available on international interlibrary loan of all the items so listed. As Parker points out in a perceptive article, this could place a strain on the library resources of the developing countries, the very countries which UBC has declared to be its main priority of concern.[1] Parker's fear is that the major beneficiaries of UBC might be the more developed nations who would gain access to the materials of the developing countries without any corresponding development of library services there.

In an allied field the revision of the Anglo-American Catalog Code, with Canadian assistance, and the adoption of the MARC format developed by the Library of Congress, are further examples of the movement towards international standardization. The continually growing mass of material to be organized and the inexorable demands of the computer for uniformity seem certain to ensure that the long hoped for universal approach to recording information will be achieved.

Politics and the world view

Unesco and IFLA are not the only international agencies with library concerns. FID has long been active in its more specialized field and we now have many other examples of similar organizations in the library and information field, such as those for school librarians, metropolitan libraries, music libraries, information processors, and Commonwealth countries. All of these bodies believe that they have a role to play in the future of international cooperation. Insofar as they succeed in gaining control over their deliberately restricted area of interest this is probably true. What must be kept in mind for the future is the necessity for all of their activities to be part and parcel of the larger scheme of worldwide library and information service development.

Ideally Unesco, for the broader issues of policy, and IFLA, for the more library oriented implementations, would seem to be the appropriate bodies to ensure that there was compatability in the programs of these many and varied international bodies. The recent politicalization of Unesco, and IFLA's concern with professional matters on a political basis do not inspire great confidence for the future. Yet whatever structure is operational in the future it seems evident that American librarianship must be involved. Apart from the belief in libraries and library development throughout the world, as expressed by the Constitution of the American Library Association, and apart from any belief in international understanding making its contribution to world peace and prosperity, there are other more pragmatic reasons to consider.

Why U.S. participation

First, the entire world of librarianship, of which the U.S. is a part, is going forward and if the U.S. wants to have any influence on the nature and direction of this progress then it has to make known its views. Second, to do this effectively it has to know what is happening in other parts of the world. In gathering this knowledge it might also discover that there are areas outside the U.S. where library matters have advanced beyond what is being done in this country so that progress or mistakes can be examined with profit. Third, there is still a tremendous reservoir of library expertise in this country which could profitably be made available to other countries; just as the U.S. made available much of its technical know-how to countries rebuilding after World War II.

If we accept then that there must be an American presence on the international library scene in the years ahead not only at the general levels but also in the more specialized agencies mentioned above, how is this to be achieved in the light of insuring that there is overall and planned participation avoiding duplication and overlap caused by lack of awareness? This is the challenge to which the American Library Association must respond. The past history of the international concerns of ALA can be read in Peggy Sullivan's 1972 article in Library Trends.[2] Since then the Report of the ad hoc committee on international responsibilities, chaired by Keith Doms, has been approved by ALA Council. Although the International Relations Office is not to be re-opened at present, the Association is in the process of appointing an International Relations Coordinator as the first step towards a revival of its contribution on the international scene. At the 1975 San Francisco Conference of ALA, the many and varied international activities and concerns of ALA units were outlined at the program meeting sponsored by ALA's International Relations Committee. This was a useful bringing together of existing programs within the Association.

In the years ahead there would seem to be two major concerns for this Committee if it is to represent American librarianship on the international scene. The first is to continue to monitor, advise, promote, and coordinate the many areas in which ALA is or should be making a contribution. This responsibility has been accepted by the Committee. The second is a much more difficult assignment which may not be handled most effectively by a committee structure itself. It is to look ahead to the changing world in which the role of the United States may be quite different from what it is today. In Parker's view "The establishment and maintenance of national networks of libraries presupposes the existence of a Western-type industrial civilization which is not only capable of producing the large quantities of documents on which the existence of such libraries depends, but which also operates on the assumption that the production of such quantities of documents is both necessary and desirable. It is worth recalling that information is not wisdom; and that a civilization based on different philosophical premises might well regard our increasing obsession with information as neurotic and even, perhaps, rather pathetic."[3]

Without necessarily agreeing with this prognostication, it would form a useful take-off point for an examination of the future of international cooperation as it affects American librarianship in the second centennial year of both ALA and Library Journal.

TECHNOLOGY MATHEMATICS HANDBOOK
Definitions—Formulas —Tables—Examples
By Jan J. Tuma

"Much more than the usual compendium of mathematical formulas given in most handbooks. . . . The book is a gold mine of mathematics from the elementary to the advanced, and it offers an excellent review of the whole field from a practical point of view. Highly recommended for engineering technologists, engineers, mathematics teachers, and all science libraries." *—Library Journal

What Dr. Tuma did for the engineer in his earlier work, Engineering Mathematics Handbook, he now does for the technologist by similarly presenting elementary and intermediate mathematics (through calculus, vectors, and matrices). Prospective and practicing engineers in technological fields—aeronautical, architectural, civil, general, electrical, and construction engineering—will find this an invaluable reference on basic mathematical procedures. 370 pages, 310 illustrations, $15.95. LC 74-26962, ISBN 0-07-065431-X.

A VITAL LINK

No bank holds such riches as this: the great legacy of learning in our libraries. Here every individual may maintain an account. Here all may borrow, in any amount, from the endless assets of the mind. ☐ The men and women who create and keep our libraries perform more than an essential service. They guard a priceless trust. ☐ Among the books and maps and atlases in today's libraries are many that Rand McNally has published—or printed and bound for other publishers—over the past 120 years. We take great pride in fine craftsmanship, and equal pride in the privilege of contributing to our libraries' inestimable wealth. ☐ It is fitting, therefore, that we should now join in marking the 100th anniversary year of Library Journal. This magazine is one vital link in the communications between publisher and librarian. It may have taken us a century to say so, but we have been constantly appreciative.

Copyright and the future of Authorship

by Barbara Ringer

I HAVE SET myself three rules in planning this article. First, I am writing for people who read this paper in 1975; readers a hundred years from now, if any, are going to laugh at me whatever I say. Second, I will try my best to make this paper less pontifical than essays in futurism usually are. Third, I am heeding the advice inscribed over the three gates to Spenser's city: "Be bold." "Be bold." "Be not too bold."

Copyright is an infinitely definable word, but for this purpose let us regard it simply as the legal condition of authorship. Considered this way, copyright is as old as the writing profession, and will last as long as there is any creativity left in the human race. When people talk about the possibility of copyright ceasing to exist, they are referring to the traditional legal system under which authors are given exclusive rights to control the dissemination of their works. Obviously this system is being engulfed by the tidal wave of technology, and has already begun to change. But, whatever emerges, there is still going to be copyright in the broad sense of the way a society chooses to treat its creative people.

"The new daylight"

In his recent and snobbishly underrated biography of Samuel Johnson, John Wain made some trenchant observations about the ups and downs of professional authorship over the past two centuries. He points out that, when Johnson began his profession in the second quarter of the 18th Century, the age of patronage had ended. Aside from partisan newspaper writing and anonymous political propaganda, the conditions of authorship during this transitional period were monstrous. Wain says: "The age of munificent patronage, of well-paid government posts going automatically to men of literary reputation, had faded almost over the horizon; the new daylight, that of the direct relationship of author and public, was yet no more than a dapple in the sky." Wain attributes the new daylight for authorship, which arrived around 1750, to improvements in communications, cheaper and faster printing, and the increase in "a more comfortable and literate middle class" resulting from the growth of trade. This analysis is correct as far as it goes, but Wain fails to note that these social, economic, and technological changes in England were accompanied by an explicit statutory recognition of authors' rights, the first in history. The Statute of Anne of 1710 gave copyright to the author, not the publisher; the great English copyright cases that followed it in the mid-18th Century recognized the author's right as a fundamental one at common law.

The "new daylight" of which Wain speaks coincided with the legal recognition of the author's copyright, first in England, second in the newly-independent United States of America, and third in revolutionary France. He describes it as "that triangle of author, publisher and reader which gave a shape to literary endeavor from the middle of the eighteenth century to the middle of the twentieth, when it collapsed again into a chaos of subsidiary rights and complicated side deals." Wain thus puts a fence around two centuries in the history of authorship. This era, which began around 1750, was preceded by the Age of Patronage. It has been superseded, beginning around 1950, by the Age of Subsidiary Rights and Side Deals. In Wain's words, the intervening period from 1750 to 1950, was the Era of the Triangle: the golden age when the author spoke directly to the reader through the publisher.

Era of the media

Wain refers to the era we are now enduring as one of chaos for authors. He is certainly right, and the reasons lie with the revolutionary changes in communications technology and the failure of copyright law to keep pace with the needs of authorship in the new era. Adopting the awful jargon of our time, let's call Wain's post-Triangle era the Era of the Media.

It seems almost superfluous to observe that the technological revolution in communications is a pivotal event in the history of mankind, and that its full impact has not yet been felt. I haven't a clue as to which of the electronic marvels will prove to be transitory toys and gadgets, and which will turn out to be something like Clarke's monolith in "2001." All I'm sure of is that, amid all the electronics, the quality of human life is changing, and that the real impact of the change has not yet been felt. I should add, perhaps, that during the work I've done over the past five years on the international copyright implications of space satellites, I have now and again felt a cold hand touch my shoulder.

The views of the author are personal and are not intended to reflect any official positions of the Copyright Office or of the Library of Congress. No copyright is claimed in this article.

". . . the Era of the Media has wounded or destroyed some traditional forms of expression, has sent some truly gifted artists off on fool's errands, and has produced an increasingly glutted, tasteless, and bored audience"

Anyone who sits down and thinks about what has happened to mass communications since March 3, 1909, (the day Teddy Roosevelt got the current copyright statute through Congress just before his presidential term expired) can come up with quite a list. Foremost would be silent and later sound motion pictures, radio and later television, and still later cable and pay-television, computers and their ability to assimilate, generate, and manipulate limitless amounts of information, satellites and their potential for reaching and linking everyone on earth, sound recordings and later audio and video tape recordings, photocopying and microreprography, and automation of the composition and reproduction of printed matter. This does not exhaust the list, and many of these developments combine and interact, providing nationwide and worldwide networks for quick or instantaneous dissemination of information and misinformation, culture and Kitch, entertainment and stupor, propaganda and personal gratification of one sort or another. And there is evidently no end to this descent into the maelstrom: a satellite capable of direct transmission into individual receiving sets is already in operation; holography is fast developing as a science and as an art; lasers are being used for all sorts of things: for data storage, for communications channels into homes, and as part of commercial video disc players soon to enter the consumer marketplace. Et cetera, ad infinitum.

Many people, including quite a few librarians and educators, still regard all this as an unqualified blessing. They are eager to press on, eyes ablaze, to buy and use all the new machinery they can afford in building their own particular bridges over the River Kwai. Their genuine purpose is to improve education, provide wider access to information, improve scholarship, and lead the way to newer and bigger technological marvels.

Controlling technology

Maybe it is too soon to judge the situation fairly, but I can't see that all this machinery has produced much except a craving for more machinery. Education and literacy are currently on a downhill plunge. Wider access to information seems to result in people being less and less informed about more and more. Scholarship and research, once based on reading and notetaking, now seems to consist of accumulating filing cabinets full of unread xerographic copies. The kids in the late '60's were reacting, among a lot of other things, to the terrible dehumanization of education and culture, but maybe their aphorism about not trusting anyone over 30 should be turned back on them. When was the last time you encountered a truly wise and fully educated person under 30? Forty? Fifty?

I am not foolish enough to think that this whole relentless process can be reversed, or halted, or even slowed by anything except lack of money. But I do think that, if we could pause long enough to examine what we are doing to ourselves, we might be able to establish some control over the development of technology for its own sake, to channel it better, and to rethink the problem in purely human terms. My specific concern in this paper is to take a hard look at what is happening to individual, human authorship, in the last third of the 20th Century.

I am all in favor of opening up new avenues for creative endeavor. Like the invention of new painting techniques and musical instruments during the Renaissance, the inventions of the past few decades have brought a new breed of creators into the whole range of the arts. They have also allowed traditional creators, like singers, actors, and instrumentalists, to fix their work permanently and to widen their audiences immeasurably. At the same time, the Era of the Media has wounded or destroyed some traditional forms of expression, has sent some truly gifted artists off on fools' errands, and has produced an increasingly glutted, tasteless, and bored audience.

A lot more people are making a lot more money out of arts and letters in the United States now than did in 1909, and some valuable tools and creative outlets have sprung into existence since then. But what has happened to the traditional authors of the Era of the Triangle: the novelist, playwright, poet, historian, composer, essayist, critic, biographer, philosopher, scientific thinker, social or political commentator?

As Wain suggests, for them the third side of the triangle began to collapse around 1950, the year when television made its great breakthrough in America. With few exceptions, traditional authors in 1975 cannot make a living from their profession any more. To write at all they increasingly must go into service to the great corporate, government, or educational bureaucracies. To a greater or lesser degree the bureaucrats control the use of their time, the content of their works, and the manner in which their works are disseminated. If authors choose to write independently, they must often push their way through a mob of hucksters, lawyers, and machines to reach a dwindling public. And that public, of course, is now spending up to half its waking hours watching dots dancing on a little tube.

". . . unbridled technology is the enemy of individual authorship, and . . . libraries seem unwittingly to be going over to the enemy"

"The Great Copyright Debate"

Assuming an author's work makes its way into print in something resembling the form in which it was written, what danger does it next encounter? Photocopying, of course, and no longer of just a page or two. In the Great Copyright Debate over library photocopying, some librarians will argue that supplying readers with single copies of copyrighted works does authors no harm and serves to increase their readership and hence their market. Admitting that hard data is lacking, this seems a questionable proposition at best. My guess is that ten or 20 years from now the damage will have become so obvious that data-gathering will be supererogatory except perhaps for establishing royalty fees.

It is now apparent that more and more libraries are reluctant to let copies from their collections off the premises. Instead of performing their traditional lending services, libraries are purveying neatly bound or slip-cased photocopies free or at cost. "Interlibrary loan" may still be "inter-library," but it certainly isn't "loan." And photocopying as it is practiced in 1975 is only a phase. Automatic hard-copy retrieval from cathode-ray tube displays of microform images is already with us, and so are worldwide telecommunications facilities to transmit those images hither and yon.

Technology vs. authorship

What I am saying is that unbridled technocracy is the enemy of individual authorship, and that libraries seem unwittingly to be going over to the enemy. Most librarians I know love books and their authors; they consider it their function in life to pass this love on: to introduce authors and their works to readers. But by supplanting the publishers' function without recognizing and affirmatively protecting the author's fundamental rights (call them copyright or what you will) libraries are destroying the very resource they exist to preserve and nurture. On the darkling plain where these battles are being fought, authors are caught in the crossfire and librarians seem to have lost their sense of direction.

A recurring pattern in U.S. copyright law over the past 25 years can be recognized and charted:

First, a technological development, broadening the possibilities for the use of copyrighted works in new media of expression, is exploited widely and successfully.

Second, after substantial investments have been made in the new development, and after copyrighted works are being used extensively without licenses from anyone, nervous questions start being asked about possible copyright infringement.

Third, it is discovered that the 1909 copyright statute and the cases interpreting it contain no answers, only analogies.

Fourth, a copyright infringement suit is brought. The copyright owner bases his hopes on judicial precedents which, up to the post-World War II era, usually found the 1909 law resilient enough to cover new technological uses (such as motion pictures, radio, and television). After 1950, however, the onslaught of technology confronted the courts with problems of a new dimension. Sometimes this resulted in outright piracy of such tremendous proportions that individual court decisions were insufficient to control it, as in the case of organized tape piracy. More often, the unlicensed use evolved gradually from small beginnings, as in the case of cable television and photocopying.

Fifth, because the 1909 statute seems so remote from the technology on which the unlicensed use is based, and because the use has become so pervasive and profitable, the courts are unwilling to condemn the practice as illegal. Instead, they declare that they are not legislators and that they must take the 1909 law as they find it. They reluctantly hold against the copyright owner, and urgently call upon Congress to do its duty and reform an archaic and unjust statute.

Sixth, the battle shifts to the legislative arena. Congress recognizes that its duty is to preserve or restore the rights of authors, but is deluged by a cascade of lobbyists for special interests based on the new technology, all urgently asserting that their services are too essential to be cut back in any way, and that they are too poor to pay substantial copyright royalties. Titanic controversies rage around the heads of legislators, who are naturally concerned about the political consequences of what they do.

Seventh, any solution must necessarily be a pragmatic one. In revising the 1909 copyright statute in 1975, the U.S. Congress cannot go back to 1950. It must reach compromises based on the situation that currently exists. Now, and even more in the future, these compromises seem likely to consist of compulsory licensing.

Compulsory licensing

The 1975 bills for general revision of the copyright law, which are now under active consideration in both Houses, represent a series of provisions embodying dozens of compromises. The rights of individual authors are made subject to a number of outright exemptions, and, most significant, exclusive rights seem to be giving way to compulsory licensing. Since the future of copyright may well lie with compulsory licensing, let me explain what I mean by it.

Throughout the variegated skein of national and international copyright regimes since 1950, a single concept insistently recurs: it is usually called compulsory licensing, although in its various guises it may be referred to as "obligatory," "statutory," "legal," or "agreed" licensing. Characteristically, it is offered as a compromise to copyright controversies in two situations: where technology has created new uses for which the author's exclusive rights have not been clearly established, and where technology has made old licensing methods for established rights ponderous or inefficient.

Under a typical compulsory licensing scheme, the author loses the right to control the use of his work, and cannot grant anyone an exclusive license for a certain specified purpose (for example: making phonograph records; performing music on jukeboxes; retransmitting television programs on CATV). Instead, his work is lumped with thousands or millions of other works, and the author also becomes a unit in a large collective system under which blanket royalties are received and distributed. The government is involved in operating the system, and the individuality of both authors and works tends to be lost. Authors may be paid well for the use of their works, but their participation in the system is, by definition, compulsory rather than voluntary. Individual authors, standing alone, are helpless to protect themselves in a situation like this. Ironically, in order to preserve their own independence as authors, they will inevitably be forced to unite in collective bargaining organizations, and to allow their representatives to speak for them.

In a speech and interview published in the April 1975, Alumni Issue of the Swarthmore College Bulletin, James A. Michener, a professional author and an astute observer, dropped some nuggets of wisdom well worth passing on:

> Reading in the United States is becoming a lost art, and I visualize the time when seventy percent of the American people will be educated outside the reading process.

> I look at my profession these days with real confusion. Book publishing is going through as great a period of chaos as any other . . . [At] a meeting of . . . leading American publishers [it was] decided that for economic reasons they could no longer read unsolicited manuscripts. So if there is . . . someone who wants to become a writer—and I know of no nobler profession in which a man or women can exercise whatever leverage his intelligence and his character give him the prospect now is dismal.

> With the spectacular success of inventions like Xerox [machines], it is now possible to duplicate instantaneously, and this is having a savage deleterious effect upon our intellectual society. . . . I am always in favor of the new inventions, the new frontier, the new way of doing things. So I am in favor of xerography. What we have failed to do, as we have failed to do so often in a complex democracy, is find a way to discipline the new invention.

> I have no idea, if I were to live another fifty years, what I would be doing then. I do not know what company would be paying me. I do not know who would be publishing me. I do not know how what I wrote would be circulated. But I do know this: Human societies require philosophers and poets and people who will look at society and make comments. They need to know what Aristotle and Moliere and Immanuel Kant thought about society. I am quite sure that fifty years from now the demand for writers will be as great as it ever was. It can never be less.

Yet, later on, speaking of an experience related to the Watergate affair Michener says, "I know exactly how Sam Johnson felt when he had to kowtow to the wealthy people of his generation and how he fought it, and when he could not win, gave in and wrote those incredible prefaces praising the very man who had demeaned him."

One can read all these trends in relation to copyright law and the condition of the individual author with genuine despair. At the other extreme, the optimism of people who are mindlessly allowing machines to be substituted for culture is even more dangerous. The full impact of technology on authorship is still to be felt, but anyone who cares about what is happening must look at the trends, which are already apparent.

"The Era of Totalitarian Patronage"

I am fairly confident that the current efforts to revise the U.S. copyright law will succeed in 1976, and will lay the basis for the conditions of authorship during the last quarter of this century. There will probably be four or five forms of compulsory licensing in the new law. Assuming that technology continues its relentless march, the demands for compulsory licensing will continue to grow. Unless they are matched by countervailing demands to protect the individual and personal rights of authors, the Era of the Media will give way to a new era of patronage, but one in which the patrons are not the aristocrats and the rich, but instead are the bureaucrats who run the State. Government control over all aspects of authorship is a real possibility by the 21st Century, and if this happens we will have no one but ourselves to blame. Michener had a foretaste of the Era of Totalitarian Patronage, and knows the circle can easily turn that way.

It is not enough to avert this danger, real as it is. As history teaches, it is possible for a rich culture to flourish even under a tyrannical system. But Orwell foresaw that, sometime in the 1980's perhaps, the combination of tyranny and technocracy could combine to destroy not only freedom of expression and the quality of life, but human culture itself.

If the users of the new communications technologies insist on using authors' works without giving some appropriate compensation in return, they will find that sooner or later there will be no authors worth reading and no works worth reproducing. The appropriate compensation cannot be limited to money or fame. Ultimately it must consist of independence: the freedom to write as one believes and to find persons to communicate with. As I see it, a bad copyright law can destroy that independence; a good one can help to preserve it.

Library Journal praises

J.W. Gitt's Sweet Land of Liberty

compiled & edited by McKinley C. Olson

". . . such clear thinking and good writing in these editorials . . . of Jess Gitt, editor and publisher of The Gazette and Daily of York, Pennsylvania. . . . [Gitt] often traveled a lonely path, because he was severely criticized as a Communist, a troublemaker, and a traitor (at least to his class). It is clear from his writings, however, that he was a patriot who dearly loved liberty and its fundamental truths."

INFORMATION RETRIEVAL, BRITISH & AMERICAN, 1876-1976
by John Metcalfe 248 p. 1976 $10.00

A concise, lively, discursive history of one hundred years' developments in information retrieval theory and practice (cataloging, classification, subject headings, thesauri) from Dewey and Cutter through LC, UDC, Bliss, Ranganathan and others to the exponents of coordinate indexing and mechanization. By the former director of libraries of the University of New South Wales.

A HISTORICAL INTRODUCTION TO LIBRARY EDUCATION: Problems and Progress to 1951
by Carl M. White 301 p. Feb., 1976 $11.00

In a revised and enlarged version of his earlier work, The Origins of the American Library School (Scarecrow Press, 1961), Carl White continues the story beyond the early forming of the American library school. New chapters describe the steps in the transition from apprenticeship school education to modern university standards and examine key influences in the swing away from the apprenticeship school tradition. This readable book affords the perspective one needs to understand library education and how it came to be what it is today.

ESSAYS FOR RALPH SHAW
edited by Norman D. Stevens 219 p. 1975 $8.00

The fifteen essays in this volume in honor of Shaw have been written by Lowell Martin, and by 14 of Shaw's former students in the Ph.D. program at Rutgers University. The essays speak to contemporary library problems with the conciseness, perceptiveness, and preciseness that was characteristic of Shaw.

LIBRARY LIFE—AMERICAN STYLE
A Journalist's Field Report
by Arthur Plotnik 226 p. 1975 illus. $8.00

"Is it good to be a librarian in America?" No one was answering that question until writer/librarian Art Plotnik traveled, camera and notebook in hand, from coast to coast to ask it himself—and to record what he learned and saw in the most vivid document of modern American library life ever to be put together.

LANDMARKS OF LIBRARY LITERATURE, 1876-1976
edited by Diane J. Ellsworth and Norman D. Stevens
540 p. (approx.) due April, 1976 $17.50

Library literature is often—and properly—criticized for its weaknesses and omissions; here is a selection intended to reveal its strengths—41 articles from the past 100 years which provide a perspective on the thinking that has shaped the library profession, and which demonstrate the impact the written word has had on the theory and practice of librarianship in the U.S. The selection ranges from Dewey and Dana, through Shaw and MacLeish, to today's Anita Schiller and Ellsworth Mason.

THE ACADEMIC LIBRARY: Essays in Honor of Guy R. Lyle edited by Evan Ira Farber and Ruth Walling 183 p. 1974 $6.00

". . . the collection of essays makes a coherent, highly readable, and consistently significant volume . . . The volume is not only a 'must' for those who wish to understand academic library problems, but also a volume which represents such uniformly high quality and readability that it offers a pleasure to anyone who has the good fortune to read it."

TOWARD A THEORY OF LIBRARIANSHIP
Papers in Honor of Jesse Hauk Shera
edited by Conrad H. Rawski 564 p. 1973 $17.00

Toward a Theory of Librarianship is more than the usual Festschrift.

". . . It is a collection of twenty-eight original papers from his confreres and cronies (with their own distinguished reputations), each one of whom wrote as he never did before to honor the man who had such a profound, sensitive, and lasting impact on developing even a hope for librarianship, let alone for its theories."
—AMERICAN LIBRARIES, May, 1973

". . . Perhaps the best way to recommend this book dedicated to the thinking man's librarian is to say that it is essential reading for those who think critically and theoretically about library science."

The Free Mind:

intellectual freedom perilous

by Eli Oboler

"LET US look forward to the future with that salutary fear which makes men keep watch and ward for freedom, not with that faint and idle terror which depresses and enervates the heart."[1]

When de Tocqueville wrote this ringing exhortation, nearly 150 years ago, he was convinced that "the press is the chiefest (sic) democratic instrument of freedom." He saw no way for the preservation of individual independence in democracies without the most absolute freedom of the press possible. Indeed, he went so far as to assert that ". . . the liberty of the press . . . is the only cure for the evils which equality may produce."[2] In his utterly commendatory review John Stuart Mill proclaimed that in a democracy ". . . the superior spirits and the government so far as it is permitted, should devote their utmost energies . . . to vindicate and protect the unfettered exercise of reason, and the moral freedom of the individual. . ."[3]

These are noble, ringing sentiments, which are good backgrounds for the expression of some simple truths which those who believe in the bright future of the free exercise of the free mind should find agreeable. First, there is no reason to assume that the free flow of ideas and argument will not result in a better life for the individual and nation. Secondly, those few who advocate suppression, restriction, and censorship are in no way, as Zechariah Chafee, Jr. has written, ". . . so much wiser than the masses that they can safely regulate their views for them."[4] Finally, the usual argument for denial of argument is a belief in the not-to-be-questioned virtues of tradition and the obvious evils of any and all change. I agree with Chafee that the best cause for all is: "Let us have enough faith in our institutions to believe that they can safely withstand voice and paper. . ."[5]

Graham Wallas had an interesting theory: ". . . the great periods of intellectual activity are apt to follow the coincidence of the discovery of important new facts with the wide extension of a sense of personal liberty."[6] Assuming this to be true—and both logic and history indicate its likely validity—then surely the cause of intellectual freedom has one more strong justification. If the individual who could help human progress advance is more likely to do so if he has "a sense of personal liberty," then it is clearly up to us to help give him that "sense." Censorship—legal or extra-legal—is thus (among other things) a barrier to the great breakthroughs to more and better civilization.

Opinion and innovation

De Tocqueville saw the greatest potential danger to that democracy which he admired as America's greatest contribution to civilization not in either political or even intellectual revolutions; he feared that "... modern society ... will ultimately be too invariably fixed in the same institutions, the same prejudices, the same manners, so that mankind will be stopped and circumscribed; that the mind will swing backwards and forwards forever, without begetting fresh ideas; that man will waste his strength in bootless and solitary trifling; and, though in continual revolution, that humanity will cease to advance."

This grim prospect of frustratingly Sisyphean "progress" seems only too possible in 1976. Whether it becomes likely, or even an accomplished fact, depends on how those who really are concerned about the freedom of the mind face up to that prospect. It is surely not pre-ordained or otherwise inevitable—but it can more likely become a reality if what de Tocqueville describes as the "empty phantom of public opinion" is permitted to become, as he warns, "... strong enough to chill innovators, and to keep them silent and at a respectful distance."

We who are the inheritors of the tradition of free opinion and who have the opportunity and responsibility to fight for that tradition will deserve the opprobrium of untold generations if we, in our professional groups and in the performance of our daily duties, do not, collectively and severally, fulfill our obligations. It is not merely rhetoric to say that the battle for the free mind, never-ending, is one battle that must always be fought and yet can never be completely won. The free mind is an ideal; so is true democracy; but democracy and intellectual freedom, even with imperfections, are certainly better than their antitheses.

Freedom is the pursuit of truth

There is a great temptation for any believer in intellectual freedom to equate the belief in and practice of freedom of expression with some kind of perfect state, perfect world, perfect life. It is, of course, only a means toward a highly desirable end, the self-realization of man and the democratization of nations. It is also a manifestly unattainable ideal, which in no way affects its practical and immediate value as the only way to come even close to that essential of a livable life, Truth.

To escape the restrictive bonds of government and society and the all-too-human limitations of individual prejudice and intolerance in regard to thought and its expression is a goal set by idealists throughout civilized history. Whether complete intellectual freedom for everyone is a reasonable aim or simply a chimera—an idealistic will-of-the-wisp that will help in the achievement of lesser, but more attainable, goals—is hardly worth arguing; the very act of working toward absolute individual intellectual freedom is a highly motivated, assuredly widely acceptable activity which merits even wider support.

It is not enough to be released from the restraints of tradition-tied church and state, of psyche and conscience, of political control and moral rectitude; it is vital that intellectual freedom, once achieved at whatever quantitative or qualitative level, be used, be exercised, to avoid atrophy. The power of the free mind is hardly a true power if it is kept in reserve for some possible future moment of extreme need. The point-counterpoint of human dialogue, whether in print, on the platform, or on film, is a truly potent force which will achieve its highest level of power only if constantly and consistently practiced.

When Thomas Jefferson contrasted the status of physical liberty with what he called "moral emancipation," this nation was a long way from the Emancipation Proclamation, and it, in turn, was only at the merest beginning of a process not yet complete—the removal of racial discrimination from American life. But the act of Jefferson's publicly stating the importance of this problem contributed its share to the ever-ongoing process of seeking human freedom. The Word has been, is, and will be as mighty a weapon as shot and shell.

John Dewey deplores the fact that "... men may be brought by long habit to hug their chains"; this is true of both physical and mental slavery. Where the chains are self-imposed and there is only apathy restraining manumission, mankind suffers the most. The intellectually free individual is the product of a long and distinguished line of fighters for the mind's freedom. In the Anglo-American tradition John Locke, John Milton, Roger Williams, Benjamin Franklin, Thomas Jefferson, Ralph Waldo Emerson, John Dewey, and Zechariah Chafee, Jr. are only a few obvious individuals among those theorists and practitioners of intellectual freedom who deserve the gratitude of any sincere truth-seekers.

But all their efforts will have been wasted if each generation does not fight its own battle against the ever-present forces of repression and restraint. From the lawyers and judges and legislators, the librarians and teachers and professors, the journalists and authors and media-men and publishers must come the leadership, the willingness to engage in even the less publicized skirmishes, often resulting in only minutely incremental gains, to keep the mind free. No single facet of human existence in society is as likely to lose its always tenuous standing, to be taken for granted, even to be nearly forgotten, as man's right to free expression, to speak and listen and read and view, to argue and debate, to have as free access as possible to the widest possible reaches of knowledge and opinion.

Freedom is individual

In the vital and abiding concerns of mankind, intellectual freedom may seem to some less important than physical freedom, or economic freedom, or equality and justice. But none of these or the other highly regarded human freedoms can endure without the first freedom, the freedom of the intellect.

There is a continuous struggle going on for the minds and hearts of men and nations. On the one extreme are those who call for a "dictatorship of the proletariat"; on the other, the individuals and groups who, in one way or another, subscribe to fascist principles. They both desire the muzzling of their opponents. Only the intellectually free will listen to both. The automatized, "nickle-in-a-slot" reaction that any risk to security justifies the denial of liberty is just not acceptable; history and reason alike are on the side of those who see freedom of speech and the press as basic to any form of truly democratic government, to a self-improving, renewing, and renewable society. (As a case in point, consider India's current situation.)

To be genuinely intellectually free is to be a paragon of paragons, a "never-was" and "never-will-be." But this is one contest where only the noncompetitors lose. It is as impossible to achieve perfect intellectual freedom as it is to achieve perfection in any human effort. That this particular effort is among the most significant and important ones that an individual or nation can make clearly justifies whatever reasonable risk is taken, whatever sensible program be followed to achieve as near a perfect result as possible.

Putting it most directly, the intellectually free are those who honestly try to find out the truth on any issue as dispassionately, objectively, and fully as human failings of mind and body permit. Any barriers to threading the maze of opinion and argument and agreement and disagreement are only achievable hurdles, not impassable walls or blind alleys . . . to the intellectually free.

Self-knowledge leads to self-realization. The intellectually free face up, not only to what A. E. Housman called "man's bedevilment, and God's," but also to their own inadequacies. No one claims that intellectual freedom equates with individual or social perfection—only that it will by definition permit a greater likelihood of both. In agreeing with Pascal when he said that thought makes the whole dignity of man, one does not have to forget that there is no more basic attribute of man the thinker than uncertainty and instability. The restless mind of man is both his badge of distinction and his primal curse. From his creation, man has been unsatisfied and insecure. And intellectual freedom is the source of his greatest pride and his greatest conflict.

The future of individualism

There is ample evidence, historical and experimental, of the fact that man is basically a social being . . . and this fact certainly affects any attempt to predict how man as an individual will do in the years, the decades ahead, so far as the freedom of his mind is concerned. Where society, in its basic urge toward self-preservation, toward continuity, toward the maintenance of traditional patterns and values, tends toward requiring conformity and decrying dissent, the individual is paramount in fighting for freedom. The great breakthroughs in invention, in truly creative matters, have always been the product of the individual, not of society. Out of this dichotomy of the society and the individual, the tension between the many and the one, must come whatever success there really is, what progress is possible in the future, as in the past.

The question is, of course, how these forces—both complementary and opposing—of society and of the individual will in fact operate tomorrow. Granted that man is, as Herbert Muller says, ". . . free to make his own history . . ."[8] (whether for better or worse), it is only a tentative, "iffy" series of guesses we can make on this topic. But we can at least attempt to make these guesses more informed than apocalyptic.

A time-traveler, capable of omniscient spatial and temporal perspective, would be utterly perplexed by the erratic ups and downs of the fortunes of the freedom of the mind of the individual from century to century—and, in this seemingly most unpredictable century (the one we live in), almost from year to year. The Victorian ideal of progress, so eloquently voiced by Tennyson, ". . . that somehow good will be the final goal of ill . . ." was not exemplified before, during, or after the good Queen's reign.

Technology vs. freedom

We are, if anything, slipping back into medieval, perhaps even primitive, beliefs and practices as regards to the opportunity and willingness to let man's mind run free. The baleful spectre of utter denial of privacy—via interconnected data banks and computers, in a wired nation—daily becomes more corporeal. Advances in communications technology are certainly no guarantee of equal advances toward intellectual freedom; they are more likely to have just the reverse effect, from all we can see at present.

Where the librarian of the first decades of this past 100 years was mostly preoccupied with the minutiae of publication-organization, today's librarian is confronted by Big Government that self-confessedly has come about as close to Orwell's "Big Brother" as reality—not fiction—could permit, as well as by a new nemesis in the form of a self-labeled "information industry." How the free exchange of ideas and facts and opinions can survive this double onslaught is the problem librarians must do their full share to solve, if intellectual freedom itself is to survive.

Property and freedom

To elaborate on this rather new and even startling concept of "the information industry," it is certainly related to the current (yet long-lasting) conflict between the authors and publishers of print and nonprint materials and those who make use of them, such as educators and libraries. Is copyright a form of control of intellectual property whose value transcends the rights of students and researchers to "reasonable" (whatever that is!) use of published materials in copied format? Is it fair to the freedom of the mind and its wide and general exercise to bottle up facts in Lockheed's computer system or in the New York Times' data bank or elsewhere, where it costs thousands upon thousands of dollars to get these facts for a single corporation or library or school?

These are not academic, theoretical questions. Upon their answers depends, it may well be, the future of any property system in information. Gene Wunderlich has recently put the modern theory behind the concept of the relation between property and information as follows:

> There is only one privacy—the free mind. Therefore, privacy depends on education, and education if product of information. All information . . . is potentially an invasion of privacy. It can be considered an invasion of privacy, however, only if it is accepted without evaluation . . . If information does pass through the gate of evaluation, it becomes a quality of the mind to be used, in turn, for growth and extension—toward a direction of freedom.
> ". . . information that is withheld may also affect the free mind . . . Property in information connotes a control of information antithetical to freedom. The price of freedom is the cost of search for information and its intent knowledge."[9]

Mr. Wunderlich enlarges on these basic points most ingeniously—but I leave his elaboration to concerned researchers. His main insight is as outlined above: we cannot have any true freedom of the mind and treat the source and the produce of the mind's ratiocination as a property right. It is fully as censorious to deny the mind its sustenance—information—because the individual cannot pay for it, as because of any religio-political-legalistic bar. When Emily Dickinson wrote a century ago, "There is no frigate like a book/To take us lands away/ . . . This traverse may the purest take/Without oppress of toll . . . ," obviously she hadn't heard of today's "information industry." They certainly demand " . . . oppress of toll"!

What this bodes for the future is difficult to judge . . . but clearly it is a problem which librarians cannot leave for a fortuitous solution. It is their concern, their problem, and, like the related problem of copyright, may very well be solved by the rush of technological advance and the power of law rather than by the librarian's sole criteria—the absolute necessity for the free flow of information if democracy itself is to survive.

Or, as Donald M. Lamberton has (rather ponderously) put it, "Those responsible for shaping information policy must determine the approximate mix of information inputs to achieve social objectives, while at the same time they must have regard for equity considerations."[10]

What helps make difficult dealing with the profit-motive as concerns information and with an all-powerful Peeping Tom of a government is that a great many self-constituted Cassandras and nay-sayers are denying that we have any hope at all. We are, they say, like the Gadarene swine, rushing down the slopes into the abysm of inevitable destruction.

But there are more hopeful voices. The ringing rhetoric of the Universal Declaration of Rights, as proclaimed by the General Assembly of the United Nations in 1948, is still, of course, more honored in the breach than the observance—but it does articulate—among its long catalog of the important (indeed, the vital) political and civil rights for all societies and all men—the rights to freedom of thought and of opinion and of expression. It is true that the Universal Declaration is not yet more than a pious hope—but a pious hope is certainly better than impious despair.

Santayana once wrote that he, for one, believed in " . . . discourse, in experience, in substance, in truth, and in spirit." He felt that these beliefs " . . . express a rational instinct or instinctive reason, the waxing faith of an animal living in a world which he can observe and sometimes remodel."[11]

No Utopias ahead

In whatever technological form the library of the future emerges, it will still have the double function of acting as a repository and a communicating agent. It will be a storehouse for information and culture, as well as a conveyor of what its public needs and wants, whether in literature, art, music, science, or any other part of knowledge and the arts. Within these known parameters, there are many improbables and unknowns. But whoever makes the decisions on what is to be stored, what is to be communicated, and how, must, if the free mind is to remain free, be equally free.

> . . . no official yet born on this earth is wise enough or generous enough to separate good ideas from bad ideas, good beliefs from bad beliefs . . .
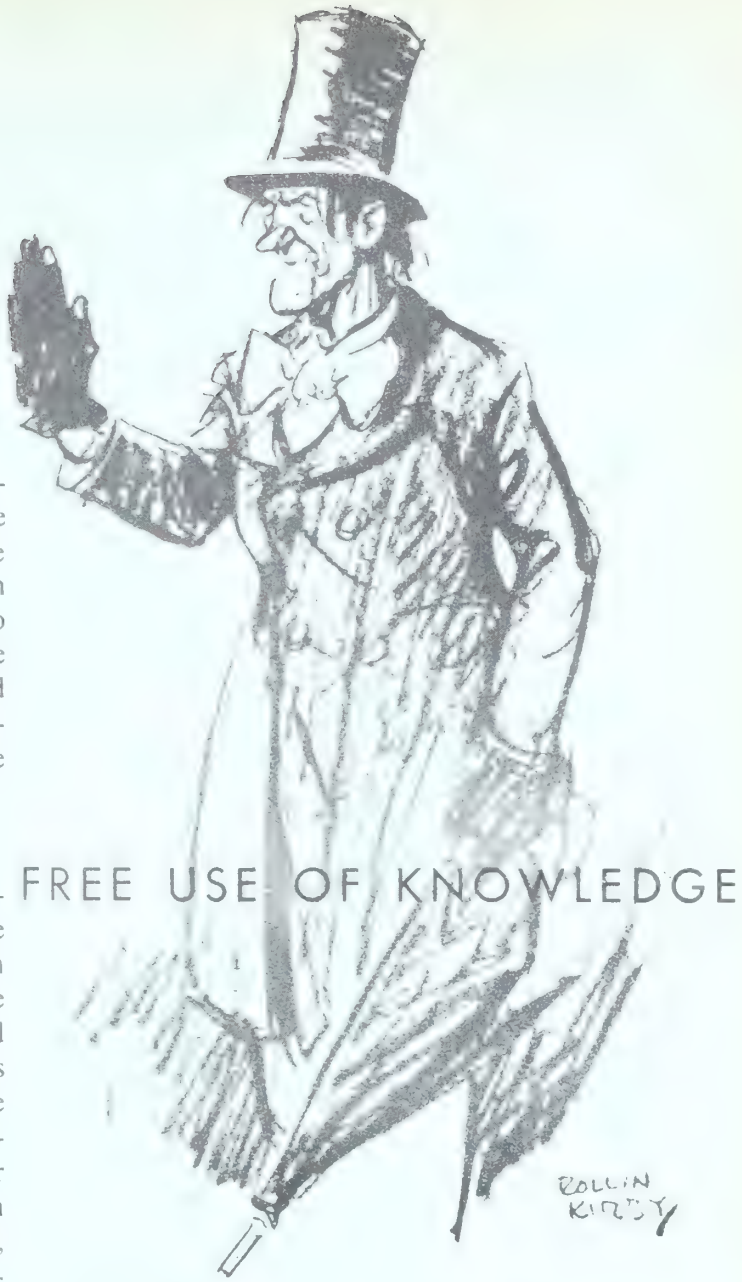
> Walter Lippmann, 1920.

Whether it is restrictive government, censorious extralegal groups, or self-censorship, it is clear that there will always—short of Utopia—be some barriers to true and complete intellectual freedom. But because there can never be perfection is no argument against working to achieve as near to it as possible. Acceptance of bondage is rarely, a conscious, deliberate act—but torpor and sloth are certainly among the enemies of freedom. Without continual, planned, reasonable action we may all be slaves of tradition, habit, and the easy way.



The Library of Rosnec

Yet even good intentions may not prevent one possible future, which must be explained (if only briefly). The Library of Rosnec will come into existence at a certain time which cannot be specified, and in a certain place uncharted on any map. But if its latitude, longitude, and chronology are impossible to state with exactitude, its main outlines as an institution are clear. Here will be the ideal of all librarians, the place where no censorship exists. Here there will be found no barriers of funding or staffing, no space or control, to the purchase, preparation for use, and making openly available all the knowledge, entertainment, the fact and fiction, wanted by the library's users. Whether in print or near-print, on paper, film, or disc, in the depths of a data-bank or freshly painted on canvas, all the treasures and despairs of man, his prides and his disgusts, will be on record in the Library of Rosnec.

But there still will remain one insoluble dilemma—the books and the facilities and the staff will all be there, but will the individual or individuals who have to make the selection of the books and the films and the records not still have to be human? Being human, will they not have prejudices? And will not the librarians' prejudices, somewhere along the line, lead to censorship—overt or covert—but still censorship?

The librarian-censor

Whether in the Library of Rosnec (the library where all the standard excuses and alibis for not having books are absent) or in your library, are not all (or at least, all but the most saintly and near-perfect) susceptible to the temptations afforded by the combination of maximum opportunity and expectable human fallibility? Rationalize as you will, most of you will surely find some occasion in your professional history when you indubitably, clearly, were more of a censor than a book-selector. It does not take a Fiske-model study[12] to verify this obvious statement. Librarians are not paragons, no matter how astute and convincing their professional education, how ethically instructional their professional experience.

This situation will not change with the passage of time, so the only service a prophet on intellectual freedom can offer, in this instance, is to advise acceptance of the perdurability of prejudice in all time to come. Whoever expects censorship to vanish entirely must, of course, reckon with the sheer cussedness of human nature. And unless the future of library service lies entirely with push-buttons and wires, we must allow for some small percentage of the group who handle library service to be censor-librarians, contradictory as those two linked appellations are. Our task is to keep that percentage to its irreducible minimum.

The library trustee and the library administrator (at whatever level), the library educator and the library association, all can and should work constantly and unceasingly to root out the consistently censorious from our profession. It will never be possible to eliminate the librarian-censor completely—but we must keep on trying.

But enough of self-castigation; we must give up the skeptic's role and retain and put into practice that "waxing faith" in discourse and truth for which the philosopher fought and argued. It is a battle which we cannot, we must not lose. Freedom of the mind is so absolutely basic that the battle for it—whether against tyrannical government, censorious minorities, or within our own minds and hearts—is too important ever to give up. The censor may always be a part of life—but so is man's indomitable will to freedom of choice, to decide for himself what he wants to say, to read, to view, to hear, to think. The library profession in 2076—it is earnestly to be hoped—will be able to look back on a century of victory over the powers of ignorance, obfuscation, and deceit.

It is also to be hoped that in Library Journal's bicentennial issue of January 1, 2076 someone may be able to look back with pride on the library profession's valiant leadership in this never-ending war. It cannot happen in a series of spectacular, pyrotechnical battles; it can only happen in the convictions and opinions of the American public, with the continuing help of day-to-day exemplary efforts by all members of our profession. This may bring about as near to a true freedom of the mind as is humanly possible. It certainly will not happen without this continuing effort.

A new attitude

To win the battles of the next generation in this area will require a whole new attitude by the library profession. Bills of Rights and Statements and Codes and all the current paraphernalia of the American Library Association and the Office for Intellectual Freedom and state and regional library associations are good beginnings—but they are only beginnings. The very limited resources of the currently sparsely-membered Freedom to Read Foundation, for example, as at present funded, cannot possibly win more than a few of the to-be-expected legal cases which must be won on a state and national basis before librarians can really practice intellectual freedom.

Just as it was the rank and file of the big unions who financed and won legal battles of the 1930s and 1940s, who persuaded the legislators and paid the lawyers to argue the court cases, so must librarianship's upcoming generation realize they cannot give only lip service to their desire, their need for freedom of the mind. It will cost more than words. But the time and the dollars and the inevitable table sacrifices along the way will be well worth it.

Without intellectual freedom a librarian is only a bookkeeper, a storer, a book-handler. With it he can fulfill his rightful function as truly a guardian of the truth. Tomorrow's librarian, like today's and yesterday's, will use all of the knowledge and technical developments currently available in the world of information—but, if our profession is to survive and keep its integrity, it can never be their servant. It is more important to make available all possible shades of opinion and varieties of creative effort than to have the widest possible range of gadgets and gizmos connected by the fanciest and longest possible networks, but including only a restricted, censored, limited range of topics and their interpretations. Tomorrow's library will be a haven for the accepted and the non-accepted; indeed, if some present trends continue, it may be the only such haven!

Two scenarios seem likely possibilities for the futurologist who attempts the admittedly difficult task of forecasting what the year 2000 will bring in the way of mind-control over literary creativeness. One can, of course, in the Tennysonian kind of vision, see a world where authors will continue to "paint the moral shame of nature with the living hues of Art," to "rip your brothers' vices open, strip your own foul passions bare." Or, at the other extreme, the censors may have once again taken over, and Elsie Dinsmore, rather than Lady Chatterley, may be fiction's exemplar. But both scenarios, like most oversimplifications of situations which involve both human emotion and reason, are not really that likely.

Somewhere between the spate of perhaps over-freely expressed description of the physiology and physical mechanics of sexual activity and the repressions of a Henry James or a William Dean Howells will emerge the fiction of the future. As librarians, our only obligation is to give all the voices every possible chance to speak.

It is doubtful that America can even keep its present freedoms, let alone improve on them in the future, without the most open society possible. We must maintain a society where all the significant issues can be discussed openly and rationally, with a solid background of both information and informed opinion. If the opportunity for promulgating possible error is not given equal scope to whatever is currently accepted as incontrovertible truth, then we are never going to know all that we should.

Every new idea is usually the result of the denial of an old truth—and we must stimulate the freedom of choice or suffer the consequences of stagnation. We who are celebrating this year the bicentennial of our political independence can best do our share toward its continuance if we remember, and prove by our actions, that political freedom can only survive if it is bolstered by independence of the mind.

Stay in the know by reading and using every issue of LIBRARY JOURNAL

("The Need to Know" doesn't stop with this special 100th Anniversary Issue!)

This message is for readers of LIBRARY JOURNAL who are not already subscribers.

Join us as LJ begins its second century of service to librarians.

Every issue of LIBRARY JOURNAL—22 a year—will add to your knowledge . . . save you time and your library money . . . and make each working day more rewarding for you.

LJ reviews and previews approximately 6,000 books a year. Covering the complete range of fiction and nonfiction. Each review is written and signed by a specialist. These reviews help librarians invest every book dollar wisely—no matter what the size of the budget.

In addition to internationally respected and quoted reviews, LIBRARY JOURNAL brings you articles on timely, controversial topics . . . important books to watch for in coming months . . . recommended professional reading . . . news of people, events, products and services . . . meeting and convention reports . . . and much more. Including several oversize announcement issues and other special numbers.

In short, there's more editorial material in LIBRARY JOURNAL than in all other library magazines combined.

And the cost is only $19 for a full year. That's the lowest price available. (Your subscription is a tax-deductible expense, of course, when used in connection with your work.)

So if you have "The Need to Know" and want to keep up with "Libraries in America's Future," use one of the handy subscription cards to start LJ coming to you regularly.

Media and Film Catalogs produced for School, Public and College Libraries

Most A.V. or Media Librarians have the chore each year of producing a printed catalog of the holdings of their library. It usually means carefully typing and proofing the same media entries year after year. It is a time consuming and laborious job.

The Science Press automated system is the answer to a moderate cost and labor free catalog. Whether you use our media description or your own, the answer to lower cost and automated know-how is as near as your mailbox. Remember, with an automated system you only have to proof an entry once . . . the first year it enters your catalog.

Write today for your free, personal copy of "Film and other Media Catalogs for Schools, Public and College Libraries."

Gentlemen:
Please send me a copy of Film and Media Catalogs for Schools, Public and College Libraries.

If the official magazine of the Smithsonian Institution isn't in your library, make some noise. Quietly.

Why? Because students need SMITHSONIAN. And so do general readers. SMITHSONIAN is a rich—and exciting—source of information. Ideas. And inspiration.

Like the Smithsonian Institution, SMITHSONIAN Magazine covers a wide range of the human experience. It delves into the arts. Sciences. Wildlife. Civilization. Environment. Exploration. Americana. History. And more.

Articles in SMITHSONIAN have given readers an inside look at China—from the port of Shanghai to rarely-seen agricultural communes deep within the mainland. Observed America—from its tremendous inland waterway system to its inner cities and the struggle to preserve their character. Rediscovered ancient civilizations. Reexamined the planet Mars and what it reveals about our Earth. Studied the use of nuclear energy through the eyes of a prominent scientist. Interpreted the teachings of Shinto and what it tells us about man's relationship to nature. Explained how the continents were formed. And how the American nation was formed. And all this is only the beginning.

Few general magazines are as detailed in their facts and sources or as scholarly in their attitude as SMITHSONIAN. Yet every feature article brings out the excitement of its subject. The language is vivid and concise. And color abounds throughout every issue—with brilliant art reproductions, photography and illustrations.

Perhaps that's why SMITHSONIAN'S circulation has reached one million in just a few years. But even if it weren't so popular, SMITHSONIAN would still belong in your library. It's for the people who do research—and for everyone who has a healthy curiosity about this world of ours. It's a shame to think that a magazine of this quality may not be available in your library—especially at a price of only ten dollars for 12 monthly issues. So if it isn't, make a little noise. By quietly sending in the coupon.

Smithsonian belongs in your library.

Open Wide.

A rebound book is useless if you have to struggle to open it. A cleat sewn book opens wide. That's just one of the reasons why librarians who want the most for their money are turning to cleat sewing for library binding. Cleat sewing is a new concept in binding which combines the best of sewing with adhesives to produce an excellent product at a cost that can be surprisingly low. A cleat sewn volume is a "librarian's book". Good looking. Easy to use. Tough enough to withstand years of hard use. For additional information on cleat sewing, write or call Les Williams, Dept. Social Responsibility:

an agenda for the future

by Patricia Glass Schuman

I LIVE IN NEW YORK CITY, a city on the verge of collapse the newspapers tell me. I listen to the polemics taking place on all levels of government with a conviction that "it can't happen here," but with a sneaking suspicion that it might, and elsewhere too. The bankruptcy of a city threatens not only jobs, but the support structures which make life possible in a complex urban environment. The depression of the 1930s was signalled by the stock market crash of 1929; will the depression of the 1970s be signalled by the economic bankruptcy of local governments? Why is it all such a numbing shock? Who can even guess at the outcome? Why didn't anyone even anticipate the problem? Doom has become boring.

The angry optimism many of us felt in the 1960s seems to have turned a bewildered skepticism in the 1970s. Librarians, along with most segments of society, have a feeling of powerlessness—as individuals and professionals. Events rush past us almost before we comprehend them. Our worst fears, and some we could never have imagined—institutionalized repression, economic chaos, immoral men in high office, illegal wars—have become the trite reality of the present. There is a curious sense of déjà vu as revelations of attempts to control through undemocratic means continue to emerge.

Those of us who spearheaded the movement for greater social responsibility of libraries in the late sixties viewed libraries as important and effective instruments of social change. A spirit of movement and action was pervasive and strong. Despite the labels hurled at us: "New Left," "Young Turks," "idealistic," "anti-intellectual," we envisioned libraries as places which would play a role in achieving a just, humane, and democratic society. Librarians were "change agents" who, through their information skills, might help the general populace to gain the information they needed to alter the quality of their lives. Libraries to the people. Power to the people. Naïve, perhaps, but certainly not very radical ideas in a democracy. Somehow these ideas never quite made it. Social responsibility as a philosophy of librarianship is still in a nascent stage. Although the movement generated over-reactive fears of apocalypse from those who misunderstood it, it has barely reached beyond formative action—resolutions which had very little effect, and a few innovative programs, many of which are now threatened due to a lack of funds. Although some people's consciousness may have been raised, many more heads were stuck in the sand. The latter regard this crusade against the status quo as a nihilistic and threatening concept.

"Too often, intellectual freedom has been used as a smokescreen to perpetuate existing ideas and prevent criticism of them"

Birth of SRRT

Up to now social responsibility has been defined organizationally, through the establishment of a Social Responsibilities Round Table (SRRT) of the American Library Association in 1969, which was to: "Provide a forum on the major issues; propose activities which will increase understanding of these issues; promote action towards resolution of attendant, critical problems." It was not until 1971 that social responsibility became a priority of the American Library Association, defined as: the contribution that librarianship can make in ameliorating or even solving the critical problems of society; support for all efforts to help inform and educate the people of the United States on these problems and to encourage them to examine the many views on, and the facts regarding, each problem; the willingness of ALA to take a position on current and critical issues with the relationship to libraries and library service clearly set forth in the position statement."

To date, SRRT has attempted to turn this definition into action. But, mild as these statements are, they were seen as the antithesis of library service. Some librarians felt that intellectual freedom and social responsibility were squarely at variance to each other, without realizing that intellectual freedom is part of social responsibility. Social responsibility proponents were not espousing the suppression of access, but rather the ideal that libraries must work for equality of access for all people, not just say that they do. Information on abortion is not a new phenomena; it is just new to libraries. Our operative mythologies blur our vision of reality.

Myth I is pervasive and insidious: Institutions are neutral, and those within them must be neutral in order to be effective. Professionals can and should strive for objectivity, but each of us is a product of our biological and intellectual environment. Objectivity demands that we attempt to recognize our own psychological and cultural biases, sift all the facts, and make judgments based on these facts. Neutrality allows us to believe that we have no effect. But, "to neutralize," is to make something lose its effect, to take a negative form of action. Recent revelations about activities of the CIA and FBI have made us all embarrassed witnesses to the horrifying results of what Warren Bennis terms "collective immorality": decisions and actions taken by moral men and women (including the decisions to remain silent) who, gathered together under an institutional umbrella, suppress their humanistic ideals in favor of institutional goals which basically negate the existence of humanity. Often these goals are no more than the preservation and perpetuation of the institution. Take the statement of the director of one of the nation's largest public libraries during the Vietnam moratorium: "It is not that the library is against peace, but neither is it against war." Substitute the words freedom and fascism, equality and racism, and the absurdity grows. Silence has been recorded throughout history as affirmation. It is surrender, as the "good" Germans learned to their dismay. (Speaking out does not mean, and never has meant, that one prevents others from doing likewise.)

Myth II is a basic tenet of our often misguided professional philosophy: Intellectual freedom is an end in itself. Intellectual freedom is certainly an essential means towards the creation and maintenance of a just, humane, democratic society. The end is a society in which intellectual freedom and all other freedoms guaranteed under the Bill of Rights will flourish. No one ideal can be guarded at all costs while others are allowed to languish, or they will all die. Too often, intellectual freedom has been used as a smokescreen to perpetuate existing ideas and prevent criticism of them. The virulence with which critics of sexist children's literature are attacked by those supposedly defending intellectual freedom is but one example. These critics are not suggesting the removal of materials: they are suggesting that alternatives to predominant materials be provided, that intellectual freedom become an active process which helps to achieve freedom from stereotyped socialization so that all children can have a shot at fulfilling their potentialities. True intellectual freedom is the free exchange of all ideas as a means towards achieving a truly open and legally free society.

Myth III is that libraries provide free access to information on all sides of all issues. This is a goal to strive for, but in reality libraries only provide some information on some sides of some issues to some people, and this information is certainly not free; it just depends on who is footing the bill—the taxpayer, the community, the city, the state, endowment funds, private industry, etc. Libraries are limited by their ability to handle that which is available, and their ability to pay not only for information products, but for services which will make information available to library users in a usable form. Rarely does our profession actively encourage such industries as publishing to make sure that materials are available, and even less often are we willing to collect "ephemeral" materials such as pamphlets and underground newspapers which might complicate our procedures. (The few libraries which have accepted this responsibility are, to a great extent, academic or research-oriented ones concerned with preservation—not dissemination.) Libraries specifically choose not just what information they provide, but when, where, and how. This heady goal of free access is slipping away from us daily during the current economic crunch.

Myth IV is that libraries are not political institutions. You could have fooled me. This is possibly another version of the neutrality myth. I was under the impression that libraries were competing in the political marketplace for funding and favorable legislation. Four Presidential vetoes of library funds, our opposition to the appointment of a historian as a librarian of Congress, and our position on copyright revision legislation should be enough to explode this myth once and for all.

Demystifying a profession

If we can finally face up to the demystification of our profession, then we can go one step further to the thesis that libraries are institutions whose service affects, and may even change, society. Francis Bacon said long ago, "Knowledge is power." Today, Daniel Bell and other social scientists tell us that information is very definitely power. They define our present society as "post-industrial," one in which the organization and codification of theoretical knowledge becomes paramount for societal innovation, and intellectual institutions become central to the social structure. This society has three dimensions: a change from a goods producing society to a service producing society; a rise of an intellectual technology as opposed to a machine technology; a centralization of theoretical knowledge. Information is the force which transforms in this post-industrial society, just as energy was the transforming force in industrial society, and natural forces were in agrarian society. Unfortunately, the majority of society is suffering from an information overload. Too much is hitting the senses at once. New ways of thinking of social structures which will help us to cope, sort out, and survive have not yet been developed.

Intellectual technology and the centrality and power of information contains the potential for great harm as well as good. Social scientists and communications theorists agree that some filtering is necessary in order to make the overload of information usable. Librarians have a vital role to play, a social responsibility, to work towards an invention of the future which is free and just for all. A participatory information structure may be the only antidote to the authoritarian potential of technology. Libraries are invisible; they may fast become obsolete. To become part of the information structure of the future the profession must overcome what Alvin Toffler so aptly terms "future shock." At present, the profession is an elitist one which views the flow of information in top-down terms. The flow of information from librarian to client is a static process. We can no longer attempt to fit the questions of our public into the mold of what exists in our collections, but must fit our active services to the questions—both those that lie on the surface, and those that are not quite so obvious.

The information loop

"Democracy is no longer a political luxury, but a primal necessity . . ." says Toffler. "The faster pace of change demands—and creates—a new kind of information system in society: a loop rather than a ladder. Information must pulse through this loop at accelerating speeds, with the output of one group becoming the input for many others, so that no group, however politically potent it may seem, can independently set goals for the other." The information loop points out two basics for the library profession. We have no right to set social goals by ourselves and hand them down, but neither can we accept goals blindly from a "higher" authority. We are obligated to participate in social goal setting and to aid in the creation of mechanisms for the participation of others. Libraries, as the only institutions which profess the goal of collecting and disseminating all information (unsuccessful as they may have been) have a responsibility, a social responsibility, to become curves on the information loop; to facilitate—and even to create—information power for all people. To provide such power, libraries and librarians must not only survive, but participate fully in the vital decisions to be made while shaping the future. It is foolish to believe that we are the only information agency vital to society, but it is realistic to realize that we are an information agency which allows for instant action and reaction. We are not merely traffic cops directing raw information to users. We are going to have to participate with (not sit back and wait—or force upon) people to sort out information priorities, to make information usable and understandable, and to provide the necessary information in time for it to be usable. In our capacity as librarians anticipating and filling information needs, users may have many needs they may not even be aware of, as any librarian who has ever answered a reference question knows.

Action on information needs necessitates dealing with problems—information problems. Is the information need of the user who requests information on his eligibility for welfare really going to have his need filled by having you hand him the welfare regulations? Will he be able to interpret them? If he does, do they include all the possibilities? Can he work through the bureaucratic application maze himself? And just suppose all of these problems are solved—by the library, by community referral, or by the user himself. Isn't the fulfillment of this particular information at best a tourniquet—and at worst a Band-Aid? The more complex questions are: Why is he on welfare? How can he get off? Why does the welfare system exist in the first place? What are the alternatives?

"A participatory information structure may be the only antidote to the authoritarian potential of technology"

Creating tools for change

Libraries must begin to provide not only the information tools which will allow individuals to better manipulate the system, but those that will allow them to research and change the system. The provision of these tools implies not only the purchase of what exists through normal distribution channels, i.e., a book from a publisher, but the creation of information. Librarians do not seem to hesitate at the thought of computerized data bases for professional researchers, but they seem intimidated at the idea of selective dissemination of information to the public. We have MEDLARS; where is our "LEMEIS" data base? (Let Me Survive, or legal and medical information for survival.) Our elitist and passive role has so far recognized our obligation to organize information for some other professionals, but this role also allows us to abrogate our own obligation as information providers. This is not to say that librarians should become doctors or lawyers, but there is a good deal of medical and legal information the lay person must have access to in order to survive that need not be transmitted by other professionals at fees of $25 an hour or more. Some very basic examples of legal and medical information libraries might provide are materials on self-examination for breast cancer or handbooks on the right to privacy. We could work with legal and medical experts to set up a meaningful "LEMEIS" data base, one that is constantly made responsive through feedback and input by its users.

Toffler's information loop will be functional only if it is a flexible means to enable individuals, groups, and concerned organizations to continually posit questions and answers. There is an alternative contrary to those predicted in 1984 and Brave New World, and librarians have a role to play in achieving it. But first the old shibboleths must be laid to rest and we must accept the fact that we are responsible for whatever effect we have—or fail to have. The schizophrenic dichotomy librarians have tried for so long to preserve between their actions as private citizens and their actions as librarians who are employees of specific institutions just does not hold. "The loyalty of the professional is to his profession," John Gardner points out, "and not to the organization that houses him at any given moment." Breaking out of the hierarchy will not be easy. We will have to learn as we act and continuously define our role. The future of libraries may be in our very ability to define the social responsibilities of libraries and librarians. This cannot be done in a vacuum; it can only happen if we place ourselves in a constant input-output position with others. If we begin to identify issues, to take action, and begin to build a socially responsible information agenda. An agenda which will propel the world we know into a truly participatory society. It is one thing to provide information to people; it's quite another to help them to demand it as a right. Positing questions and trying out answers, of course involves informed judgment—an advocacy stance which forces us to continually ask: "Why not?" and a nondogmatic philosophy which allows us to move forward quickly enough to keep up with society in flux.

An agenda for libraries

How can we posit the questions and try out the answers? There is no easy prescription. Some of the steps librarians might initiate, in addition to making sure that NCLIS (the National Commission on Libraries and Information Science) deals with the information needs of all people, are to begin the information loop by seeking the realities of our services in order to discover the possibilities. This process could be started by:

Calling town meetings with our users, be they individuals, community groups, business people, students, or others.

Initiating a national, continuing communication with other professions and constituency groups (women, minority groups, political groups, etc.).

Making all future library conferences—regional and national—"think tank" sessions where we talk with, not at, each other.

Developing programs to bring representatives of all segments of the population and professions together to plan new information structures.

These are just beginnings. The process will be continuous, but flux will not prevent us from having to choose at many levels along the way. Eventually we are going to have to advocate a specific, flexible, course of action. As a profession, we will have to face head-on the question of our role in society. Events of the past few years clearly illustrate that libraries are often considered passive, expendable institutions in communities which have been forced to set priority goals in order to survive the present. Grimmer still is the possibility of a static profession—failing to take responsibility for molding its own future. As Daniel Bell recently warned the American Society for Information Science: "If you don't know where you're going, any road will take you there."

Your one, best first source for single issues, scattered issues, and missing volumes- USBE.

Time saver Send your periodical order to USBE first and you may never have to try another source. If the issues you want are in our stock of four million (35,000 titles) you'll get them promptly. We'll break a long run to supply you with one issue or with scattered issues. We also supply complete volumes and long runs. By sending only one request you save your time and the time of the reader who needs the periodical. For any issues not in stock we offer back order service, another time saver.

Money saver You pay a small standard handling fee for each copy you receive. The average price for an issue is only $2.08 — that's less than 40% of the price you'd pay elsewhere. Our prices are the same for expensive scientific journals as for lower cost (but often harder-to-find) periodicals. And there's no minimum invoice. Why are our prices so low? Because we keep costs low. By operating as a nonprofit librarians' clearinghouse we receive without charge periodicals that our members don't need.

Books and documents, too We also supply books and documents, current and out of print, from a changing stock of more than 100,000 volumes. (As a member, every month you'll receive several offer lists.)

But our main service is the exchange of serials. That's why after 27 years of successful operation we're changing our name. Our friends will still call us the USBE. And they'll tell you that we're the one best first source for periodicals.

The John Carroll Papers

Edited by Thomas O'Brien Hanley, S.J.

The papers of John Carroll (1735-1815), American patriot and first Roman Catholic bishop of the United States, are now published in comprehensive form for the first time.

From his strong support of the Declaration of Independence to his leadership of the Church in America, John Carroll was deeply involved in the life of the new nation. His letters to George Washington, Benjamin Franklin, John Hancock, his cousin Charles Carroll of Carrollton and other leaders provide a remarkable record of the times. And the documents dealing with the consolidation and growth of the Church in America are a source which scholars will mine for years to come.

Drawn from the large manuscript deposits in the Archdiocesan Archives in Baltimore and from more than twenty repositories in Europe and America, these three volumes contain all of the writings of John Carroll as found in original sources, with translations of Latin, French, and Italian items and richly informative notes.

catalogs and literature on books and collections available as microfilm or xerographic reprints

Books and Collections are available on demand . . . as individual titles, complete collections, or sub-collections in the subject areas listed below. To obtain catalogs or other literature on any of the listings, simply check off the items you want and mail this page (or a copy of it) back to us. All literature is free except the Genealogies and Family Histories catalog, for which prepayment of $1.00 is required.

Of special interest during the Bicentennial period . . . will be two collections available from Xerox University Microfilms' important American Periodical Series and American Culture Series, the latter based on the David R. Weimer Bibliography of American Culture, 1493-1875. AMERICAN PERIODICALS OF THE 18TH CENTURY includes all issues of all periodicals that could be located for the years 1741-1800 and offers a running account of the Colonial and Revolutionary periods. The AMERICAN REVOLUTION collection from the American Culture Series includes 235 books and pamphlets which are available individually, or as a group, in (xerographically produced) hardcopy or microfilm format. This collection offers a balance of both primary and secondary sources under the following section headings: Pre-War Conditions and Debate, British and American Opinion, 1775-1783, The Military, Biography, Special Aspects, and Overall Analyses and Accounts.

15 YEARS OF INDEPENDENCE

"Who is going to buy your books?" The Banker peered through his steel-rimmed glasses as we explained in 1960 our reasons for believing there was room for still another independent publisher of quality books. "We plan to publish mainly for the nation's libraries," we replied, nervously. Fortunately the Banker's mother-in-law, a librarian, had just sent him a copy of Library Journal (naturally, her favorite publication) predicting spectacular growth in library budgets.

We got our loan and started our Company. Since then, 15 years and 1000 titles later, we have been gratified that librarians have indeed proven to be our best supporters and have enabled us to grow from year to year. Most important to us, you have made it possible for us to remain independent. We do not hide behind the anonymity of a giant corporation. You have given us the freedom to publish many books of taste and value.

Thank you!

Toward a Feminist Profession

by Kathleen Weibel

REDEFINITION of the role and position of women in society has again become a major social movement. Paralelling the first wave of feminism which culminated in the right to vote, the "women's movement" has made its way from the organization of a small number of middle-class women to a broad based movement of women working in homes, industry, and offices, gay women, single parents, and others. Their rejection of traditional social, sexual, and economic dependencies has already made an impact on individuals, both male and female, and on the institutions of society. The future of this movement ranges from potentially revolutionary to mildly reformist, with the ever-present danger that a male dominated power structure may become female controlled but equally oppressive. The direction of the women's movement will not evolve in a vacuum; a host of factors will help shape it, including the condition of the economy, racism, and scientific discoveries. With this in mind, then, what is the impact of the women's movement on librarianship?

One might expect it to be considerable. Librarianship as a profession is 84 percent female (unless otherwise noted all figures are taken from the U.S. Bureau of Labor Statistics' Library Manpower).[1] If statistics were available on all those employed by libraries, the percentage of females would most probably be higher. To varying degrees, issues of the women's movement such as child care, role definition, equal pay and opportunity have become concerns of the institutions which define libraries: schools, colleges and universities, business, government, etc., as well as concerns of the constituencies served by these libraries. Executive orders and legislation on equal pay and opportunity have also had a direct impact on a number of libraries, including the Library of Congress.

On the other hand, libraries have not been noted for their quick institutional response to social movements. Within the profession itself, organized activity on the part of women came a bit later than in other professional or academic groups, including those such as nursing also dominated in number by women. Organized participation in the overall women's movement has not yet developed as a vigorous concern of the profession. No library defined group, for example, is listed among the 75 diverse organizations (American Nurses Association, National Gay Task Force, Hadassah, etc.) contributing to the creation of the U.S. National Women's Agenda.[2]

While discussion of women in librarianship and action on the issues raised by women have increased greatly in the last five years, knowledge of the status of women librarians and their impact on library service is still limited to scattered data and research, and opinion pieces such as this. Anita Schiller has culled a description of female librarians from the literature which most librarians can corroborate from individual experience: women do not predominate, in top administrative positions, in large libraries, or in the "status" branches of the profession. The salaries of women are generally lower than those of men, and the average salaries of the profession are generally lower than those of similar male dominated professions.[3] The role of women in the initial development of the field is currently being explored by Garrison, among others. Schiller points out that the profession has not considered women an appropriate concern for a directed research effort since 1904.

It is the purpose of this article to explore the future impact of the women's movement on librarianship with the year 2000, the upward boundary. Anyone reading the projections of futurists written as recently as five years ago known the pitfalls of this type of forecast. (Since cliches about our rapidly changing society are all too true.) Our limited knowledge of the position of women in librarianship and the factors determining it, coupled with the fluctuation and conflict within the women's movement, and the potential for backlash against women's liberation, complicate the precariousness of such predictions. But, since problems, trends, and questions can be identified and discussion generated from futuristic musings, I'm willing to take on the role of seer.

The women's movement has effected libriarianship primarily in matters relating to employment. The affect on services and the nature of the profession is more subtle, if it yet exists. Certainly this effect is more difficult to observe and measure than the more visible discrimination suits, for example, although the impact of such actions are also difficult to determine. Assuming that the women's movement continues at least at its current strength, its impact could be felt by librarianship in three general modes: 1) as a women's profession in which females make up the majority of the work force; 2) as a feminized profession with the "negative" connotations of characteristics labeled female such as passivity, emotionalism, and intuitiveness, 3) and as a feminist profession operating on a feminist value system wherein traditional roles based on sex and power are no longer extant and life choices and ability determine functions. Of the three areas, the last is the most speculative, but the most far-reaching in its implications.

Librarianship as a woman's profession has received more attention in the literature and limited data gathering than the other two. The problems of a feminized profession have also been discussed directly and in the many considerations of the profession's image. Little research has been done in this area. Librarianship as a feminist profession has received the least consideration although the newly formed Woman Library Workers seems to be attempting to grapple with it, as a "growing sisterhood of non-submissive, life affirming women who are committed to action programs in democratically run libraries."[4]

A women's profession

Once fields become established as men's or women's professions they are very hard to change.—Anita Schiller[5]

Librarianship will continue to include enough women to remain a women's profession during the next 25 years. Whether the percentage of women will equal or continue to surpass the percentage of men depends on a number of factors. Although men have been attracted to librarianship in growing numbers in recent years, a proportionate increase in the number of women entering the field has caused the percentage of females to drop only a few points. The ratio of men to women in the under 45 age group is higher, however, than in the total profession. As of this writing, 44 percent of all employed librarians are age 45 and over. Almost half the women in the profession are in this age group and are likely to retire during the next 25 years. The ratio of male to female librarians replacing this 44 percent of the profession, and in the under 45 age group now practicing, will determine the sex characteristic of the profession in the year 2000.

What the influence of the contracting job market on the entrance of men and women into the profession will be, is difficult to say. Fields such as engineering and law, which had previously not been overly receptive to women, are now actively recruiting and may very well draw women away from the traditional women's fields. Consideration of desexualization of role may also make men feel freer to enter the women's professions.

At the same time that librarianship is placing a growing emphasis on the hard sciences as undergraduate preparation, fields traditionally dominated by men, business, industry, and academe, actively seek women with these qualifications to meet affirmative action quotas. Librarianship may not be able to compete for these women as a career option, meaning that entrants into the profession with scientific preparation are even more likely to be men.

The question of people with advanced academic qualifications in other professions, the humanities, and social sciences, moving into librarianship due to job shortages in their own fields will probably have an influence, but it is difficult to suggest a direction in terms of sex in these fields. Interest in part-time work and job sharing currently voiced by both men and women, but usually associated with women, will influence the availability of positions and qualified women to fill them. The effect of re-entrants into the profession, who will probably be women, and drop outs who may be either male or female, must also be considered. A safe projection, then, is that librarianship will continue to be a women's profession although the percentage of women will drop below the present 84 percent mark.

Librarianship as a whole may remain a women's profession in 2000, but men may very well predominate in certain types of libraries, particularly academic where they now account for 44 percent of the professionals. Special and public libraries will also reflect a change in the male:female ratio, with special libraries possibly swinging toward balanced employment of men and women. Even in school libraries, where women dominate in numbers greater than their percentage of the total profession, men may make considerable inroads. Projection by type of library must take into account growth possibilities in each type. Enrollments in elementary and high schools, for example, are expected to pick up during the 1980s and to drop in higher academic institutions during this period. Whether more men or women will move into the school library field where jobs should be more plentiful is an open question.

Staffing of the various library functions will also reflect the change in the numbers of men in the profession. In the case of administration, the push towards equal opportunity may counterbalance the projected increase in the number of males. Certainly it has already been an acknowledged factor in restructuring of procedures used to fill positions and in the actual filling of some jobs. It is safe to say that we will probably see more women administrators in the traditionally male dominated top positions in the larger, more prestigious libraries. Whether women will retain their rapidly diminishing predominance as administrators of the smaller institutions, particularly public libraries, is more questionable. These institutions are not as visible, the pressures in them less, and possibilities for reaction against the historical dominance of women greater.

At the same time that women have been pushing for admittance to higher positions, they have also sought the development of lateral career structures. Women who do not want to be administrators are actively seeking personal and financial recognition of their contribution to the profession. Revised career structures would also benefit those men who do not wish to take the administrative route which they are sometimes unwillingly nudged into. The plight of the excellent reference librarian, for example, forced into administration to advance his or her career has been a concern of the profession long before the women's movement. This additional impetus should speed the process. It may have a positive effect on services, as well as influence the balance of male:female administrators.

A gender breakdown of aspects of librarianship other than administration is not readily available (a telling fact in itself). Since the profession is 84 percent female and more males than females hold the bulk of administrative positions, one might conclude that the technical support and reader services are composed of women. There is a general impression that men may be more populous in the automation and information science areas of the field than in readers services. We just don't know. In public and school library youth services, an area most would agree is truly dominated by women, and where other factors, such as the long proposed merger of the two institutions' services and the growing acceptance of men working with children are known, questions can be raised. What will be the scope of opportunity for men and women in this service? Will men be more sought after than women? Otherwise, projection beyond a statement that change will occur because of the adjustments in the sexual makeup of the profession as a whole is not possible.

A feminized profession

I hope you won't repeat that quote from Justin Winsor again!—A Feminist Librarian Friend

"That quote" refers to Winsor's 1878 summary of the value of women in librarianship as cheap well educated labor with the additional service, softening, and housekeeping instincts needed in the profession[6] and characterizes much of the sentimental comment on women in library literature. Sentimentality is not the only response to women. An anti-feminine bias on the part of both men and women also exists and manifests itself in characterizations of niggling spinsters, uncommitted mothers, and the sheer number of women in the profession as a weakness. In fact much of the literature of women in librarianship treats feminine dominance as a problem: the problem of a feminized profession.

An acceptance and even affinity for bureaucratic and hierarchical structures, humanitarian service rooted in the emotions, task rather than intellectual orientation, and compliance are the hallmarks of the feminized professions and are the subject of innumerable articles in the literature of librarianship. Whether one attributes these characteristics to the dominance of women alone, not at all, or in combination with other factors such as association with the educational, cultural, and nonprofit segments of society, these do seem to be the acknowledged generalizations about the profession and are voiced both within and outside of librarianship. Simpson and Simpson cataloged these and related tendencies and characteristics of feminized or semi-professions and concluded in the late sixties that "so long as our family system and the prevailing attitudes of men and women about feminine roles remain essentially as they are now, this basic situation seems unlikely to change."[7]

The women's movement, however, is challanging prevailing attitudes toward female and male roles. In addition, the literature concerning sex differentiation indicates socialized and not innate origins for the roles and characteristics identified by Simpson and Simpson and seen in library literature.[8]

Librarians concerned with the sexism of children's materials acknowledged the importance of socialization to the challenges of the women's movement. But what of the adults who inhabit Libraryland? Library literature offers no response. To project a defeminized profession it is necessary to move outside librarianship—toward those who are attempting to define feminist, not feminized, values and structures.

Women are seeking to define themselves through control of their bodies, equality in their relationships, and freedom of choice in their career. Participatory rather than hierarchical structures, the development of the individual as well as of the collective movement, and, responsibility rather than dependence are goals of the women's movement. Rather than replacing passive with aggressive behavior, new models such as assertiveness are being explored. As women pursue these and other changes it seems reasonable to expect that their work styles will reflect them.

Activity on the part of women librarians for their own liberation as women and as librarians has been growing. There is a proliferation of their literature, for example, Women Library Workers and Emergency Librarian, as well as an increase in the number of articles elsewhere. They are organizing new professional associations or groups within existing organizations such as the SRRT Women's Task Force. There is regional and local organizing of library women in Massachusetts, Chicago, California, New York and Connecticut. For those librarians active in or supportive of the women's movement, and this includes men as well as women, the characteristics of a feminized profession are in opposition to their commitments. These commitments require an assertive response to client information needs, practiced in an open flexible institution.

At the same time library literature indicates an increasing interest in nonhierarchical or collegial management styles, more autonomous practice of the profession, and flexible approaches to career ladders. If the increase in library science doctorates is any indication of an attempt to build a more knowledgeable base from which to design services, the profession is also moving away from its emotionalistic roots. Convergence of these with the similar interests of the library women's movement should strengthen librarianship so that the image can be overcome and the profession is no longer "feminized" in the pejorative sense.

The impact of women's challenge to traditional male and female roles in the next quarter century will also help shape the character and values of the men and women who choose to enter the profession. The direction and degree of their role redefinition will mirror the changing agenda and influence of the women's movement. Librarianship's own redirection will influence the values and characteristics of those who choose to enter the field. If the profession does not keep pace with the challenges of the women's movement and its own innovators, it may remain a feminized profession in the worst sense of the term, no matter whether males or females dominate in the year 2000.

A feminist profession

I hate not men but what it is men do in this culture, or how the system of sexism, power dominance and competition is the enemy—not people, but how men, still created that system and preserve it and reap concrete benefits from it.—Robin Morgan, Monster, p. 83.

Discussion of librarianship as a feminist profession is highly speculative. Consideration of the potentials of feminist values is essential to making the women's movement more than just a numbers game. The purpose of the women's movement is not more women administrators, male children's librarians, or clerk typists. These are manifestations of the central issue: the development of role-free human beings, they are not ends in themselves.

A feminism built on humanitarian values and advocacy of women's full participation in political, social, and economic spheres shares a call for the redistribution of power with other social movements. Feminism further calls for a transformation of our concepts of power: compassion and support rather than aggression and dominance. As a value system as well as a social movement, feminism demands a change in basic assumptions as well as an alteration in life style. While feminism is associated with the women's movement, belief in and actualization of its value system are not confined to women. Men may have a limited role in the women's movement, but they have a full role in the struggle for human freedom which is here labeled feminism. How they choose to develop that role is up to them as individuals and as a social grouping.

The potential for feminist librarianship lies in the men and women of the profession who hold feminist values. Their ability to implement the changes in the assumptions of the profession and to build new approaches is unknown. Brief examination of library employment and services through the focus of feminism is the only projection possible.

If librarianship accepted the feminist values of eliminating the dominant or single breadwinner per living unit and encouraged more people to work while balancing time for personal and community activities, the profession would be characterized by job sharing, serial, and part-time work arrangements. Individuals choosing these work styles would have the same benefits and career options as those who choose full-time work. Continuing education not confined to job related subjects will be available for all levels of employees with adequate counseling time and general encouragement provided. Acceptance of the potential for individual contribution should result in creative job design possibly crossing current professional/nonprofessional lines as well as participatory decision making. Equal pay for equal work is, of course, a given, as are just payment for ability and effort accompanied by adjustment based on need.

Implementation of feminist rooted library services would be based on a concept of equal services for all users: SDI for children as well as scientists. Free access to information will continue as a central tenet of librarianship in the year 2000. However, demystification of information and advocacy will be given equal billing. Rather than attempting to build institutional empires, libraries will act as catalysts in the larger communication environment. Service plans will be flexible and designed with user input and evaluation. Because feminist values imply a reworking of national priorities, more financial support will be available for institutions such as libraries, if they respond to needs in a feminist and humanist mode.

These employment and service scenarios drawn for feminist librarianship are but one possibility on a wide spectrum of potential. The year 2000 could just as readily see us only inches ahead of our present view of the profession or even behind it. Women and the women's movement are not meant to be portrayed as saviors of humankind nor of librarianship. A process of defining and working towards a realization of feminist values, however, is relevant and possible.

The spectre of a truncated women's movement, bereft of feminism, must also be raised. Freedom of choice for women, at the expense of the caring, warmth, and sensitivity to others so often associated with them, may be empty. In the thrust to redefine male and female roles, women must not become men; nor can men be permitted the continued dehumanization of their role.

For librarianship, triumph of the women's movement without feminist values may result in meaningless proliferation of networks, self-perpetuating institutions, service built on expediency, and a lowering of capacity to meet the user needs to a level below that of its worst days as a "feminized" profession.

The Law of Our Land: Vital to the Need to Know

This Centennial Issue probes library responsibilities and opportunities in meeting the need to know of our people. It thus provides a vital service to concerned and dedicated librarians planning for the future.

For Americans, the need to know encompasses many areas. Among these areas is the law. Every citizen deserves ready access to the laws, state and federal, that regulate, guide, protect and benefit him. Only libraries can provide this access conveniently.

West, which has been a leader in law book publishing since 1876, urges librarians throughout the country in this Bicentennial year to take a careful look at how well they are meeting their patrons' need to know about the laws that vitally and intimately affect them every day. Perhaps we can help you in this examination. West Publishing Company, St. Paul, Minnesota 55102.

Change in Education for Librarianship

PROPHECY is an enterprise chronically fraught with peril. The chief risk is the almost certain prospect that at least some, if not all, of our most carefully drawn formulations about the future have an extremely high probability of turning out to be entirely wrong. Despite that danger, a conscientious, thoughtful effort to anticipate the precise character and nature of coming events is a critical element in institutional planning. Those responsible for library, media, and information services must try to foresee, and act in anticipation of, likely changes in the needs of their clienteles, and in the kind and level of resources that can be expected to be available to meet those needs. In precisely the same way, and for precisely the same reasons, educational agencies serving the library and information professions must plan in terms of what appear to be likely scenarios of future events.

As Toffler and others are fond of pointing out, the classic human response to predicting change is to assume that the future will, in its most significant characteristics, resemble the present—a present that may be perceived as closely resembling the past. In education for the library and information professions, it would not be difficult to demonstrate the operation of this principle. Indeed, the very fact that the library school curriculum in 1975 so closely resembles in so many of its essential elements and governing assumptions the curriculum I first encountered as a student more than 20 years ago, makes this assignment considerably less intimidating.

To observe that the alumnus of 1955 would note the presence of many familiar landmarks in the curriculum of 1975 is not intended to preface a ringing denunciation of the library education establishment. If the sixties hold any lesson for education and for society, it is that while radical change may at times appear both necessary and desirable, not all radical change is necessarily change for the good.

The simple fact is that much of what has been traditional in education for librarianship, like much of traditional librarianship itself, genuinely merits both preservation and continued careful nurturing. Such fundamental concepts as that of the social responsibility of the librarian for the preservation, organization, and transmission of the accumulated record of human thought and intellectual achievement, the power of freely accessible information and knowledge to enchance the quality of individual and national life, and the ethical commitment of the information professional to dedicate his skills to the improvement of the human condition, are central to that broad humanistic tradition that is, and will continue to be, the basis for a sound and useful professional education.

Libraries and information centers cannot remain static, however. They exist and operate in the context of a dynamic social environment. The schools that serve the library and information communities do change. They will continue to respond to the altered expectations of their clienteles, and to meet their obligation to contribute to shaping the basic character of future professional practice. Recognizing that it is desirable for library schools to achieve and maintain an optimal balance between tradition and innovation, it is useful to try to identify more precisely those aspects of education for librarianship that are likely to change in the near or longer term future.

"The insistent question—are there too many library schools pumping too many new graduates each year into a flooded job market?—must be squarely addressed"

Jobs for new professionals

The most urgent and immediate questions concern number, the changing patterns of supply of and demand for professionals in libraries, especially at the beginning level. The severe current contraction of the job market for new librarians is already too well known to too many in its more devastating human consequences. If the Bureau of Labor Statistics is to be believed, we can look forward in the next decade to a professional job market where supply and demand are, at best, roughly in balance for new library school graduates.[1] There are an appreciable number of skeptics, including many currently unemployed younger librarians and more seasoned, disappointed job seekers, who judge that even the cautious projections of BLS may prove overly optimistic. As a consequence, a chorus of voices can be heard loudly proclaiming that the library education apparatus has been disastrously overbuilt. The insistent question—are there too many library schools pumping too many new graduates each year into a flooded job market?—must be squarely addressed.

Though the questions of number are simple and easily expressed, simple responses are not adequate for them. In the first place, supply and demand never have been and never will be a matter of numbers of people in relation to numbers of available jobs. Distribution is an equally critical factor. A good many, if not most, library schools draw students from, and place graduates in, predominantly local or regional markets. Moreover, librarianship is characterized by a high proportion of individuals with little or no geographical mobility. Questions of supply and demand, and of the size and number of schools appropriate to a viable relationship between the two, are most profitably considered not in a national, but in regional and even more narrow local contexts.

The proper staffing of libraries, media centers, and other information agencies must be understood in terms of both quantitative and qualitative dimensions. Simple numerical adequacy is no guarantee of a satisfactory supply of new librarians who possess the specific qualities and qualifications needed to meet future staffing requirements. The great danger in exclusively quantitative perceptions of the supply-demand relationship is that these may lead, as they already have in some places, to a wholesale abandonment of organized recruiting efforts. Such a response is dangerously simplistic and potentially disastrous for the future of library and information service. This is not the time to abandon the talent hunt, but it is an opportunity to exchange the shotgun for a high-powered rifle with a sophisticated, telescopic sight. It is the time, not to give up recruiting for the library and information professions, but to effect a dramatic change in the character of that recruiting. It is time to shift the emphasis away from simple numbers of people, and to concentrate instead on a highly selective but equally intensive effort to attract new entrants with desired personal and academic qualities and qualifications.

Single-product industries are highly vulnerable to fluctuations in the marketplace. If the mercantile parallel proves apt, then it is likely that some library education programs oriented exclusively to the preparation of potential new entrants at the level of the first professional degree, and serving saturated job markets, may very soon be forced into the educational equivalent of receivership. For other schools, the end of more than three decades of insistent pressure from the field to produce greater and greater numbers of new librarians will provide a welcome opportunity to upgrade the quality of the first professional degree program, and to reallocate available faculty and institutional resources to more diversified activities and programs. The result could be highly beneficial to the constituencies library schools serve.

The multi-purpose degree

The concept of the "multiple-purpose" MLS program that purports to prepare individuals for a variety of positions in various types of libraries has regularly been questioned by both educators and practitioners. While some modification of this concept with respect to programs leading to the first professional degree in librarianship seems likely in the relatively near-term future, it is by no means clear what form this might take. It may be that the economic impact of steady-state budgeting in higher education will compel public acknowledgement of what has long been tacitly recognized by library educators. It is not possible for a single school to achieve uniform quality across the full range of contemporary library specializations in a one-year program. The recent accreditation by the Committee on Accreditation of the American Library Association of a "single-purpose" program may inspire some multi-purpose schools with less than adequate resources to re-define their offerings in narrower terms. Others, while retaining the "multiple purpose" designation, may single-out particular functional or type-of-library specializations within which the school will seek to achieve greater depth and enhanced instruction.

". . . we seem to be witnessing the emergence of a whole range of new 'information careers,' alternative occupational avenues open to those whose basic professional education is less narrowly vocational in character . . ."

New information careers

By contrast with this trend, but not in contradiction to it, there are significant forces at work within education for librarianship that promise to result in a broadening of the mission of the library school. New graduates and the educators concerned with their placement have been forced by the contracting institutional job market to identify alternative employment settings within which the skills and knowledge of librarianship can be employed. Concurrently, we seem to be witnessing the emergence of a whole range of new "information careers," alternative occupational avenues open to those whose basic professional education is less narrowly vocational in character, and who have the imagination to identify hospitable nontraditional working environments.

The recent decision to rename the former School of Library Science at Syracuse University the School of Information Studies, accompanied by a restatement of its mission in terms of preparation for a spectrum of information careers including, but not limited to librarianship, is one illustration of a growing trend. In a similar vein, the Graduate School of Library and Information Sciences at the University of Pittsburgh currently offers several programmatic and curricular options at the master's degree level encompassing both preparation for employment in traditional library settings along with distinct but parallel academic tracks culminating in a Master of Information Science degree, with a discrete specialization in either information systems design or information counseling. As a consequence of the emergence of a new and powerful "science of information," characterized by methodological approaches and conceptualizing powers the capability now exists in some schools to redefine the educational mission in wider terms.

Continuing education

The library education community is moving toward a different, more balanced "mix" among pre-service education (with which many schools have been almost exclusively preoccupied for the last 30 years), continuing education for professionals, and varying combinations of basic, applied, and operationally oriented research. The National Commission on Libraries and Information Science is the most recent in a long line of individuals and groups to identify and highlight the need for an improved and expanded range of continued learning opportunities to upgrade the professional skills of librarians, media specialists and other information service personnel.[2] Practitioners have become acutely sensitive to the possibility that their individual competencies may have become atrophied with time, or are inadequate to cope effectively with the demands of new clienteles and unconventional technologies. We are witnessing a fortunate coincidence of timing, in which a growing demand for new continuing education programs is occurring at precisely the moment when library schools are in the best position to redirect a substantial portion of their resources to new and emerging learning needs.

Over the next ten years there could be a significant change in the composition of the student body in many library schools. The number of those seeking the first professional degree may diminish or be deliberately reduced in order to restore and maintain an optimal balance between entry-level jobs and the number of new graduates available to fill them. At the same time, the number of experienced librarians pursuing advanced training and higher level credentials could increase proportionately. Such major shifts in emphasis do not always come about easily or quickly in higher education. It is not quite as simple as adjusting the hot and cold water to make the shower more comfortable.

Complexities in change

The continuing education needs of professionals in service vary markedly from one individual to another. The task of planning programs and courses that will be responsive to these needs is complex. Certain broad areas such as management training, development of multimedia competency, and orientation in depth to computer technologies in information processing have been identified by Elizabeth W. Stone and others as the expressed continuing education needs of a cross section of practicing librarians. Even here, however, considerable individualization in the content and character of instruction is mandatory.[3] To develop effective continuing education programs for professionals, responsibility for determining the form and substance of the learning experience must be shared between teachers and participants. This differs substantially from the manner in which library education curricula have traditionally been planned.

If library education is to respond adequately to a wide range of individual, continued learning needs, then library schools will have to break free of such established pedagogical structures as the academic calendar, the academic day, even the narrow formal elaboration of credit hours and degree requirements. Innovative approaches are required in order to devise programs that are accessible, appropriate, and relevant to the needs of practitioners, while at the same time characterized by intrinsic excellence. Among the more interesting and promising responses are several recent experiments with offering instruction at off-campus locations, and the development of alternative terminal degree programs such as the Doctor of Arts in library management at Simmons College and the new Doctor of Library Science curriculum at the University of Southern California. The tutorial program at the University of Denver, which offers opportunities for intensive study in specific topics of individual interest for varying time periods, merits special mention.

"It is not appropriate or desirable that individual practitioners should bear the full cost of their continuing education . . ."

Along with expanded continued learning opportunities has come a growing recognition that traditional "descriptive," content-oriented instruction, based upon the transmission of information from teacher to student, is often not well adapted to the objectives of continuing education nor to the mature, experienced practitioners who constitute its audience. Consequently, there has been growing interest in and experimentation with such problem-oriented approaches to learning as case method and simulation instruction.[4]

Finally, while the library schools should and must bear major responsibility for developing and offering the broadest possible range of advanced study opportunities, the task is too large and complex to be accomplished unilaterally. Continuing education cannot be the exclusive responsibility of the schools. It must be characterized by a partnership between the formal educational establishment in library and information science and other agencies and groups with a stake in and a contribution to make to the effort. These include local, regional, and national library and information science organizations, state library agencies, networks, consortia, and a variety of organizations in the "for profit" sector of the information field. The recently organized Continuing Library Education Network and Exchange (CLENE) is representative in its structure and sponsorship of this kind of shared responsibility for continuing education projects, programs, and developmental efforts.

While practitioners and institutions in the library and information fields have exhibited a growing commitment to the concept of continuing education for professionals in service, this commitment has not yet been extended to a recognition of and willingness to share in the heavy costs of developing and conducting innovative, individualized learning programs. The nagging question with respect to continuing education for these professions is, simply, "Who will pay the bill"? While government, both federal and state, may appropriately be looked to, as suggested by the National Commission on Libraries and Information Science, to support developmental efforts directed towards the creation and testing of new and varied instructional formats, how will ongoing costs be met? Traditionally, universities have taken the position that such programs ought to be self-sustaining, and given the fiscal climate in higher education, it is unrealistic to anticipate that substantial institutional funds will be made available to subsidize continuing education for the library and information professions. It is not appropriate or desirable that individual practitioners should bear the full cost of their continuing education, since both they and their employers—and, ultimately, the clienteles they serve—benefit from the results. Both professional associations and unions of professional workers should, as a part of their role, recommend or negotiate the explicit obligation of employing institutions to share the costs of continuing education for professional staff.

Research

Graduate and professional schools have a responsibility not merely for the transmission of knowledge but for the generation of new knowledge through research. The achievement of a balance between the supply of and demand for newly trained librarians, as it signals the end of a period characterized by expansion in basic library education, could mark the beginning of a rich new era in both fundamental and applied research on the essential character of the information transfer process. Diminished teaching responsibilities should offer an opportunity for some library educators to allocate more of their time, energy, and talent to enlarging the body of systematic, empirically-derived knowledge, as well as to translating this fundamental understanding into the operational vocabulary of library and information center management. The presence of a growing number of experienced practitioners engaged in programs of continuing education could constitute a valuable resource for the conduct of disciplined inquiry. They could be directed towards the substitution of hard knowledge for unexamined assumptions and unverified traditional approaches to the organization and dissemination of information.

The growth and development of information science as a field of scholarly investigation also holds enormous promise for the expansion of the empirical knowledge base which must come to undergird librarianship. If the library school curriculum continues to evolve in response to an uncertain professional job market, into preparation for varied information careers, this should necessitate teaching centering on broad, theoretical constructs applicable in a wide variety of information transfer environments. Consequently, we may witness a convergence of forces resulting in curricula, both basic and advanced, that emphasize conceptual understanding in place of narrow vocational competence—in short, the sort of professional education that is far less likely to be subject to rapid obsolesence as a result of techological advance. It is reasonable to anticipate rapid evolution in the character of education for librarianship. The graduate library school could become a productive arena for the systematic disciplined examination and resolution, in both conceptual and operational terms, of what my Pittsburgh colleague Allen Kent has termed the "unsolvable problems."[5]

In reviewing the directions which education for librarianship might take in the decade or two ahead, I have not always been careful to distinguish between possibilities and probabilities. I am convinced that the potentials enumerated, and a good many others, do exist, but I offer no assurance that they will be realized. The future growth, development, and improvement of education for librarianship is not entirely assured.

Only the passage of time can measure the willingness or the ability of library educators to effect changes that I consider mandatory if the educational enterprise is not merely to survive, but to flourish, in a period of rapid, pervasive change in the fields of professional practice it serves. Library education does not exist in isolation, but in a symbiotic relationship with the community of practice which it must both support and be supported by. Consequently, library schools can contribute to the improvement of library and information services only if library educators and practitioners can forgo a joint commitment to the strengthening through diversification of the educational establishment.

Upgrading the faculty

Library education must attract to its ranks a fairer share of the best talent that is recruited to the library and information professions. The single most critical element in determining the future quality of education for librarianship will be the future quality of the professoriate. The current situation in staffing library education is not calculated to induce equanimity in contemplating the immediate future. Education for librarianship reflects a less than adequate supply of talented younger people, and even the available younger talent is not terribly well-distributed across the range of library schools. The availability of federal fellowships at the doctoral level under Title II-B of the Higher Education Act did, for a time, significantly enhance the ability of library education to compete more effectively with the rewards of practice and to facilitate entrance into the teaching ranks. The recent almost complete withdrawal of these funds has severely limited our capacity to induce adequate numbers of the most able people to shift over from practice to staffing library schools.

The future of education for librarianship and the related information professions is rich in its potential for a fuller contribution to the improvement of information delivery service. Realization of that potential will depend upon the willingness and capacity of library schools to change, of practitioners to support this educational change, and, ultimately, on the ability of library schools to achieve a level and quality of staffing that will make it possible to effectively seize upon both current and future opportunities for useful research, improved teaching, and enhanced service.

The Morality of Consent

Alexander M. Bickel

A brilliant American legal philosopher—in the tradition of Edmund Burke—presents a bold and controversial challenge to liberals and conservatives to reexamine the American system of political thought and process. $10.00

Byron and the Honourable Augusta Leigh

John S. Chapman

A challenge to the consensus on the question of incest between Byron and his half sister Augusta, this book reviews all the available evidence. John Chapman makes biographical detective work the basis for a shrewd and lively commentary on Lord Byron and his times. $10.00

Childhood in China

William Kessen, editor

Thirteen American experts in child development describe the lives of Chinese children at home, in nurseries, and at school. Filled with the kind of detail that only people trained in observing children can offer, this comprehensive volume successfully communicates what it must be like to be a child growing up in the People's Republic of China.

Failure and Success: assessing a century

by Jesse H. Shera

ONE HUNDRED YEARS provides too short a perspective for a valid assessment of failure or success in any human activity, especially for those developments of recent origin and for innovations for which the final verdict may still be in doubt. Final verdicts, one should add, are not rife in a field that, during the past two or three decades, has been changing as rapidly as has librarianship. Yet this perspective is all that the ALA has, and, coinciding as it does with the Bicentennial of our national independence, the occasion does provide the excuse for a "backward glance o'er travelled roads."

Moreover, the assessor must constantly remind himself that the terms failure and success are relative, not absolute, that they have strong connotations that can even be inflammatory, and that like beauty they reside in the beholding eye. Hence assessment must be highly personal and idiosyncratic even when there is a reasonable consensus to guide the wary interpreter. Judgment is further complicated by that great devotee of the paradoxical, Robert Browning, who held that there can be success in failure, that the degree of striving rather than the outcome was the true measure of success, and summoned a poetic ghost of Paracelsus as witness. The critic, then, must steer a perilous course between Petulance and Pollyanna. There will be those who will charge that we have come dangerously close to the former; but if they are right, and they probably are, it is because the profession of librarianship itself has often been fouled in the marshes of the latter. One cannot, then, draw a hard and fast line of demarcation and dogmatically assert that A, B, and C are unmitigated failures and D, E, and F are unqualified successes. It is not our purpose here to strike a balance, not even a trial balance, but rather to examine critically a very personal selection of the concepts and activities of librarianship during the past 100 years. Thus, conscious of our limitations and predispositions, we plunge into a very thorny thicket.

Syntheses and concepts

The Sophists, from Protagoras and Prodicus to Isocrates, rejected philosophy and its search for truth because they believed that ultimate truth was unattainable. Civic excellence became their aim, and hence they believed it unnecessary to make the claims of philosophy a principal element in their position. By disassociating themselves from any meaningful frame of reference, they fragmented their movement into four distinct lines of development: the Sophistry of Culture; the Sophistry of Rhetoric; the Sophistry of Politics, and the Sophistry of "Eristics," or Disputation. The movement, having lost its cohesive force, fell into disrepute until today it has become synonymous with spurious and illogical reasoning or argument, though curiously the term also survives in "sophisticated," which is applied to one who is particularly knowledgeable in the ways of the world, a survival, no doubt, of the original meaning of the Sophistry of Culture.

There are some striking parallels between the Sophists and librarians, and not merely because their reasoning is sometimes illogical. The librarians, too, have denied the importance of a philosophical frame of reference, and as a consequence have never developed a cohesive synthesis of their activities. As a result the movement has become fragmented, with the public, academic, and special librarians, along with the documentalists and information scientists, each group going its own way without any serious understanding of its relationship to the others.

We would certainly not minimize the importance to librarianship of specialization, particularly subject specialization. Indeed, in its formative years librarianship suffered from a lack of specialization, even to the point that John Cotton Dana and his little band of renegades were forced to leave the ALA. But specialization, if it is not to be fragmentation, must be founded on a solid understanding of its relationship to the totality of the library enterprise. Obviously the librarian concerned with the book needs of the pre-school child will be using quite different materials and serving quite a different clientele from that of a librarian employed in an industrial research complex. Yet, both of these people are librarians, having certain characteristics and procedures in common, with objectives philosophically the same. Each must see himself in relation to the totality of the field and the variations it requires in the utilization and interpretation of graphic records.

If one were to choose the greatest and most important failure of librarianship today, it would have to be this absence of synthesis which pervades every aspect of the librarian's practice. "Social relevance" has replaced civic excellence, and the documentalists and information scientists have often looked to rhetoric and disputation rather than logic. This failure to achieve a synthesis, a commonality of opinion, concerning the nature of librarianship qua librarianship, a consensus that a philosophy of librarianship would have provided, often manifests itself in subtle and obscure ways. The present writer well recalls that the late Patricia Knapp once said that the most serious impediment to the success of the Montieth College Experiment was the inability of the library staff to articulate to the faculty a theory of what the role of the library should be in the academic community.

Impact of reading

To be sure, librarianship has achieved a kind of unity in its wholly admirable, and sometimes quite successful, battle against censorship and support for the right of the librarian to preserve his intellectual freedom and the integrity of his book collections. But, even here, censorship has not been seen in terms of anything but pornographic and, on occasion, political and ideological terms. As Watergate and Nader's Raiders have shown us, there are far more important constraints of the public's right to know than the social barriers against questionable taste. The fundamental impact of reading upon behavior is still an unknown quantity, and in our professional sophistry we have held that the reading of good books will be beneficial whereas the consumption of writings of a questionable value leaves the reader unscathed. Discrimination is today a tarnished word because it has come to imply denial of certain inherent rights to minorities, but discrimination and the ability to discriminate justly are the very ends of philosophy. If librarians are dedicated to the power of the graphic record then they have an obligation to "discriminate" against those books which they believe to be inferior.

"Profession" or "Service"

We have sought a certain synthesis, too, in our insistence that librarianship is a profession, in a rather naïve belief that a term, a simple noun, can give common attributes to an activity that will substitute for a theoretical frame of reference. We argue that, because we are a profession, we must, therefore, be a cohesive whole acting in certain socially beneficial ways. Thus we reject this because it is unprofessional, and accept that because it seems to fit the definition of the term set forth more than a half-century ago by Abraham Flexner. A name, or term, is no more than a form of definition for the possession of certain attributes and does not endow those attributes where they do not exist. Unmindful that "the mark is but the guinea's stamp," we have ransacked the literature of professionalism and written seemingly endless pages to prove or to disprove that librarianship is or is not qualified to rank with medicine, law, and theology, disciplines which defined the professions in the medieval universities.

What we have failed to observe is that the term profession itself is suffering a dual fate. It has lost much of its glamor because almost every human activity, in an effort to achieve prestige, calls itself a profession. Moreover, when applied to law and medicine particularly, the term is increasingly coming to represent, not dedication to the welfare of humanity, but a cloak for special privilege, excessive financial rewards, and heavy concentrations of social power. No one should minimize the effective work of the Washington office of the ALA; it has done much to improve governmental concern with libraries, and even improve the image of the librarian. But by turning, as librarianship seems to be, toward unionization, collective bargaining, and legal protection of incompetence, we are seriously in danger of sacrificing our much heralded "service orientation." The right to call oneself "professional" must be earned, not proclaimed, and, in the case of librarians at least, it should be won at the study table, not the bargaining table.

Funding fragmentation

A kind of synthesis, at least a coordinated program of activities, was sought by the federal and state governments, through the financing of library programs. One could not properly characterize the work of such national agencies as the Office of Education, the National Science Foundation, and the National Institutes of Health as failures. All of them brought much benefit to libraries through their grants, but these too tended to fragment the field. Quite properly the National Library of Medicine directed its efforts toward the health sciences. The National Science Foundation emphasized documentation and, subsequently, information science. The Office of Education directed its major efforts to assistance of public and school libraries. The Council on Library Resources held out, at the beginning, great hope for a true synthesis, but one must admit that it has not yet realized its great promise. There has been much waste, much injudicious expenditure of funds, by all of these agencies. In part the fault lay in the failure of their leadership to comprehend the importance of a holistic approach to library problems and needs. In part we may have been misled in our belief that synthesis can be bought. We as a profession have complained that these agencies have forced librarianship to go in directions we did not want to go by the simple act of either withholding or granting financial support, and on the other hand we have charged them with a lack of effective leadership. The great failure is to be found in the inability of librarians themselves to recognize the fundamental importance of synthesis and to articulate that need to the major sources of aid. All of these governmental instrumentalities have floundered, yet while doing so have still managed to do much that is good. However none has achieved the promise that accompanied its birth; the reason is, itself, subject to serious investigation. We can scarcely cure the ailment when its causes are unknown.

Education and research

In librarianship's failure to evolve a theoretical structure that would accommodate a synthesis, education for librarianship must accept a major share of the blame. Library education has always tended to follow rather than lead. No one can doubt that Williamson's famous report on library education of 1923 is a landmark work; it was perceptive, its criticisms valid, and its recommendations were sound. But it has not yet achieved the results that had been hoped. Even after becoming dean of the revived library school at Columbia University, Williamson, himself, did not accomplish many of his goals. The transfer of library schools from training classes to university campuses altered but slightly the basic curricula. Course offerings did not profit from the academic environment, and theory was still sacrificed to craft. Undergraduate library programs, particularly for school librarians, are still very much with us, jeopardizing general or liberal education, attenuating the substantive subject major and minor, and presenting librarianship at its lowest technological level. The substitution of the master's degree in librarianship for the older fifth-year baccalaureate proved to be mainly an alteration in nomenclature. Even today, though professional education in librarianship has made some impressive gains, and at least at the level of the doctorate, students are given the opportunity to pursue advanced study in the several academic fields, library education has not achieved the rigorous discipline of its counterparts in the subject fields. Library routines still occupy too much of the students' time, and the youthful candidates for the profession are not encouraged to formulate for themselves a synthesis of librarianship derived from their educational experience.

The Chicago texts

The attempt, at the end of the 1940s, by the Graduate Library School of the University of Chicago to prepare a series of basic texts in the sciences, the social sciences, and the humanities was a complete disaster. It was the original intent that these volumes would not only serve as basic writings for the core courses, but also would provide for a unified approach to librarianship from which the student could gain a perspective of the parts to the whole. Similarly, it was the intent of the promoters of the so-called "foundations courses" to place before the student an integrated introduction to the library school curriculum, but these courses, where they have survived, have themselves fragmented into specializations of the participating instructors in a way that can be called "turn" rather than "team" teaching. Quite naturally, also, these courses almost inevitably represented the particular emphasis of the school and the enthusiasms of the instructors. The result has been widespread student dissatisfaction and an opportunity lost through inadequate planning. Such instruction requires the experience and skill of the master teacher, yet too often such faculty members, engaged in advanced teaching and research, are quite understandably unwilling to make the sacrifices that such teaching demands. Therein lies an academic paradox that is not confined to library schools.

Accreditation and excellence

The most serious failure of all in library education, however, has been its inability to formulate and maintain standards of academic excellence. The original Board of Education for Librarianship and its successor, the Committee on Accreditation, never very effective at best, completely succumbed before the onrush to establish new library schools, by the proliferation of which librarianship is now threatened. We lift ourselves by our own bootstraps, faculty of schools undergoing accreditation review go forth to accredit other schools. The new standards, which were heralded with so much fanfare, proved to be different from the old in only minor and relatively insignificant ways. Accreditation proceeded always from the bottom rather than the top—school A is no worse than school B, and B is accredited, ergo. . . . Reams of paper work have been substituted for effective scrutiny, quibbles over goals and objectives replaced seminal questions about program excellence, and the sluices have been opened to mediocrity until:

Breathes there a school with soul so dead
That of it COA has said,
"This cannot be accredited?"

With generous support from the H. W. Wilson Foundation, the short-lived Office of Library Education was established at ALA headquarters. But its only accomplishment, apart from a brief "policy statement" differentiating several types of educational programs, was to give moral support to the Conant study, the results of which are still to be heard.

Wilson's GLS

Yet, for all its manifest shortcomings, library education has to its credit one monument to success that towers above all others: the Graduate Library School of the University of Chicago under its distinguished dean, Louis Round Wilson. To library education in the 1930s it brought many things: a new spirit of critical inquiry, a searching for answers to fundamental questions, a view of librarianship as one of the social, rather than the humanistic sciences, an insistence that students must enroll in appropriate subject disciplines available in other parts of the university, the inclusion of representatives from other faculties in the university to assist the candidate for the doctorate in the pursuit of his dissertation research, and, perhaps most important of all, a new vitality, a new dedication to scholarship, that library education had not previously enjoyed. A shelf of solid research studies, initiated by the school, poured from the University of Chicago Press. Their very titles reveal the areas of the school's concern, and its philosophical frame of reference. Pierce Butler, in his Introduction to Library Science, examined the scientific foundations of librarianship; Douglas Waples' People and Print, and What Reading Does to People, were fruits of his inquiries of the social effects of reading; Carleton Joeckel's Government of the American Public Library, was a fresh examination of the place of the library in the political process, and James Westfall Thompson's Medieval Library was a monumental contribution to library history during a period that had previously been largely neglected. The summer conferences beginning in 1936, with Library Trends, were librarianship's first major attempt to formulate an effective continuing education program. Students, too, were set to burrowing like rabbits over the entire library terrain, and many of their dissertations were published, some even becoming landmarks in our professional literature. The school on the Midway was, in those days, the "briar patch" as Waples called it, for the serious, scholarly, and critical student, and though it was constantly under attack from the profession at large for being "too theoretical, too statistically oriented, too filled with sociological jargon taught by men most of whom had not been practicing librarians," its graduates went out to write a name for themselves in library administration and education. During the late 1940s, the program of the school was expanded under a succession of deans, Ralph Beals, Clarence Faust, and Bernard Berelson, and pioneering work was begun in bibliographic organization, documentation, school and children's librarianship, and special librarianship, but by that time library education was beginning to emulate what Chicago had done and was doing, so the old impact of innovation was gone. Wilson's regime was born of a very special era and unusual conditions, and these, in conjunction with "another Wilson" are not likely soon to return.

The mere mention of the Chicago school brings to the fore the question of research in librarianship, for, though the Graduate Library School did not invent research in librarianship, it was the one great driving force in that activity at a time when librarianship had not been research-oriented. The doctoral program, initiated by Chicago, was, of course, a research degree and even its candidates for the M.A., most of whom were expected to have completed their first year of professional study before enrolling at the GLS, were required to present a thesis that evinced the capacity to engage in serious research. In those years the students, like the faculty, were productive, and many of the Chicago dissertations were published, either as monographs or in abridged form as articles in the Library Quarterly. Students explored topics in patterns of reading interest and behavior, the history of books and libraries, printing and publishing, and the governmental and administrative relationships of the public and the academic library. Much of the work done there by the students is, of course, now quite dated, but that is not to say that it was not influential, and a small part of it is still important in current library scholarship.

Breaking down open doors

From Chicago, this research enthusiasm spread rapidly to other library schools though the results often left much to be desired. Of library research Ralph Beals wrote, in 1941:

> This class is not limited to statistical studies; nor do all statistical studies, as such, necessarily fall within it. Several statistical studies of librarianship bear out Andrew Lang's contention that some men use statistics as a drunkard uses a lamppost: for support, not for illumination.

What Beals wrote of statistics in library research during his day may now be said of much of the mathematics that adorns current library research. But library research has been unimpressive for other reasons, too. Much of it is expended on problems that are relatively trivial, transitory, and hence inconsequential. One may even doubt that they present valid credentials as research. Our research, like the profession itself, is fragmented, uncoordinated, and carried out without any valid frame of reference. Enthusiasms in research are manifested in waves which rise, crest, and subside with considerable rapidity. We have had citation analyses, attitude and personality research, case studies, patterns of information behavior, cost effectiveness, and a host of others. One should not condemn all of this as waste, but it must be admitted that we have spent an inordinate amount of time mathematically and in other ways breaking down open doors. So absorbed have we been in the leaves, forgetful that by autumn they will be gone, that we have neglected the trees as well as the woods. Who will read much of our research a decade, let alone a century, hence. But this may be unfair; in most disciplines research has a short half-life, and there are but a few landmarks that have withstood rapid changes in what Thomas Kuhn has called the scientific paradigm. Let us then be patient with the methodists in their white aprons and hope that from this number there will emerge our own minor Newton, Darwin, or Einstein. We must not yield to despair or indulge our enthusiasms in excessive praise. Honest and forthright self-criticism is essential to the survival of learning. Trial and error, success and failure are the warp and woof of both education and research. Sunlight and shadow are inextricably mixed beneath the groves of academe.

Landmarks

More of importance happened to American librarianship in 1876, than in any other single year in its history. After an abortive attempt to found a national library association in New York in 1853, the ALA was formed at the Philadelphia Centennial. Melvil Dewey published in that same year the first edition of his Decimal Classification; the U.S. Bureau of Education issued, in a volume of more than a thousand pages, a survey of libraries in the United States, and with it came, as a supplement, Cutter's rules. Finally, in 1876 the Library Journal began and for a time served as the official organ of the ALA. It was quite a year, and whatever one may think of Dewey, the activities of the ALA, the obsolescence of some of Cutter's rules, the Bureau of Education survey, and the causes espoused from time to time by the Library Journal, one must acknowledge that each played a major role in shaping the course of the American library movement. Judged by any standard they were successes. Even the now obsolete Bureau of Education survey is a mine of information for the historian and a backdrop for the assessment of today's progress.

Were there "giants" in those days? Perhaps not, but there were certainly men and women who were leaders of considerable stature and the influence they exerted must be categorized as successes. Perhaps distance, historical perspective, has lent enchantment to them and their lives, but it does seem that:

> The eldest hath borne most; we who are young
> Shall never see so much, nor live so long.

Continuing "celebration"

Over the years, librarians have talked and written at length with more enthusiasm than rationality about the values of continuing professional education. But ambition has outrun realization, and too much has been expected of too little; we have been unwilling to make the personal sacrifices that such education demands, and the resulting programs have been more celebration than education. Education is not achieved over a weekend in the convivial atmosphere of a conference. Such assemblies may be enjoyable, inspiring, and even informative, but they are not to be equated with education.

Louis Round Wilson, who had long been a true believer in the importance of the adult education movement, did not invent continuing professional education for librarians, but the summer institute for practicing librarians, which he inaugurated at Chicago in the summer of 1936, was the first serious attempt of its kind. At the start, the program was an ambitious one. The institutes were of two weeks duration, a collection of books and periodical articles relevant to the subject of the institute were set aside and participants were expected to read them. Formal discussions as well as lectures were the core of the program, and the registrants were expected to emerge from the "course" with a solid understanding of the subjects presented. It was not long, however, until it became apparent that two weeks of such study was more than the profession would support, and the program was shortened to one week, and eventually to three or four days. The reserved collection of reading materials was also an early casualty; it could not compete with the lure

"Perhaps the ALA can never be more than an organization for the promotion of library interests and public support, and if that be true there should be some kind of instrumentality that would look to the intellectual interests and scholarship that is central to the profession. The loss of a once great scholarly tradition has been destructive of librarianship" of night life along Michigan Boulevard. Yet, for all the alterations, the Chicago institute still remains as the outstanding example of success, and a number of its Proceedings have become minor classics in their respective fields. Forty years of successful operation testify to their value and the contribution they have made to our professional literature.

"Conference-happy"

In recent years, librarians have tended to become "conference happy," stimulated by the ready availability of federal funding, largely from the U.S. Office of Education. Pre- and post-conference sessions attached to the annual conventions of the three national associations have proliferated with abandon. State and regional institutes, again fed largely from the federal treasury, have become commonplace, and, indeed, it is an unimaginative library school that cannot conjure up an excuse for a conference of some sort at least every two or three years.

John Cory, during those all-too-brief years when he was Executive Director of ALA, argued vigorously that the association did not need two annual conventions a year, but the only response was to expand the programs of the Midwinter sessions to a full week, add program sessions to the business meetings, and even promote exhibits. There can be little doubt that the machinery of operating the ALA is approaching the danger point. The valid charge can be made that many of these conferences, institutes, and "seminars" are only librarians talking to themselves, when an additional need, so far as continuing education is concerned, is for the enrichment of these programs through interdisciplinary emphasis. The INTREX conference sponsored by MIT in 1965 pointed the right way so far as continuing library education is concerned. It brought together in the stimulating atmosphere of Woods Hole, Massachusetts, a group of librarians, library educators, scientists, subject specialists in the several academic disciplines, who met and talked together for an entire month. It was a rich and rewarding experience for all who were fortunate enough to have had the opportunity to participate in it, yet its like has not been seen since. The spirit that underlies continuing education is, of course, laudable, and it should be encouraged, but before rational planning begins, it should be preceded by a thorough and objective analysis of what our existing conferences are accomplishing, what benefits librarians derive from their semiannual conventions and other meetings, and how this proliferation of haphazard institutes and their ilk contribute to the professional education of those who attend.

ALA a la ASIS?

The ALA has had, for a long time, a great enthusiasm for self-scrutiny that has at times become almost an obsession. The several Activities Committees have followed each other in rapid succession, and in recent years we have had ACONDA and ANACONDA. All of these, however, have dealt with administrative and organizational problems rather than program effectiveness with the result that Plus ça change. . . . The association has never been a learned society, as ASIS is now struggling to become. Perhaps the ALA can never be more than an organization for the promotion of library interests and public support, and if that be true there should be some kind of instrumentality that would look to the intellectual interests and the scholarship that is central to the profession. In the final analysis, the loss of a once great scholarly tradition has been destructive of librarianship.

The Public Library Inquiry

Implicit in the purpose of the Public Library Inquiry of the late 1940s was the attempt to bring the scholarship of the social sciences to bear upon the public library and thus to achieve a synthesis of its functions as a social instrumentality. The Inquiry was criticized from the start, mainly because it neglected certain important aspects of the library's work, particularly the neglect of service to the school, children, and to the young adult. Only in two volumes was the goal achieved: Oliver Garceau's The Public Library in the Political Process, and especially, in Bernard Berelson's The Library's Public, both of which have become minor classics. It may be symptomatic of the state of library scholarship that the first was written by a nonlibrarian and the author of the second soon left the library field to devote himself exclusively to sociological research.

Systems . . .

Perhaps we may now look to the emerging discipline of information science for the philosophical synthesis of the library profession. The advent of the computer and the adaptation of automation to library procedures is compelling librarians to analyze, more thoroughly than they have done in the past, what they are doing, and ask if it should be done. With these new developments has come an inquiry into cost effectiveness which, if it does not jeopardize program effectiveness, should be beneficial. Particularly important is the growth of systems, which are compelling interlibrary cooperation in new ways and forcing a new understanding of library functions. All this "Librarians are trying to help the disadvantaged, even though we are far from certain of what the disadvantaged need. Perhaps more than others, librarians are implementing affirmative action. Most important of all, we are divesting ourselves of a sense of inferiority and the need to apologize for being a librarian" can be most beneficial to librarianship so long as machines and the demands of the machine are not permitted to dictate the character of and limitations upon our professional services. The machine is a powerful tool, but still only a tool, and we must not allow what Abraham Kaplan calls "the law of the instrument," to rule our professional lives.

At a recent joint meeting of the American Assembly and the American Bar Association, Harlan Cleveland, Director of the Aspen Institute's program of International Affairs, said of the advent of systems:

> . . . systems thinking has created new ways to help an individual encompass in a single mind the "situation as a whole." The fast computer, and the complex simulations it makes possible, become key tools for analyzing conflict, forecasting economic processes, assessing the future impact of present technologies, studying events as the interplay of many conditions, constructing decision models, and applying mathematical probability to social and political guess work.
> Don't get me wrong. There are dangers in excessive dedication to systems analysis. We moderns are all too good at getting rapidly and efficiently to where we don't want to be when we get there. Still, it is useful for the decision maker to be able to analyze what can be analyzed—so long as he remembers only to guess at what can only be guessed at.

"There are dangers in excessive dedication . . . we moderns are all too good at getting rapidly and efficiently to where we don't want to be when we get there." Is this to be the future of American librarianship during the next one hundred years?

Laurels

In the preparation of this article it does seem that failures have come more readily to mind than successes. Perhaps we have been too impatient, too unwilling to wait for results. We must remind ourselves that centuries were required for chemistry to divest itself of alchemy and that the medical profession has not yet entirely rid itself of the witch doctor, the homeopath and the aliopath. Certainly the day is past when criticism of one's elders brought threat of professional suicide. "I have been at this conference three days," an attractive woman once told an early meeting of the Junior Members Round Table, "and no one has spoken to me except a couple of exhibitors' salesmen." The voice of youth is now making itself heard, and it is a strong, courageous voice. The ALA is far more democratic now than it was in those days when the membership rose in revolt against the Milam regime and elected "Skip" Graham to the presidency.

To its credit the association is waging an effective battle for intellectual freedom and against the forces of censorship. Librarians are trying to help the disadvantaged even though we are far from certain of what the disadvantaged need. Perhaps more than other professions librarians are implementing affirmative action. Most important of all, we are divesting ourselves of a sense of inferiority and the need to apologize for being a librarian. This change is especially true of those of us who call ourselves Mr. rather than Ms. "On the way in from the airport the taxi driver asked me what my business was," one of our contemporaries once told a little group of us standing in the lobby of the conference hotel, "but I couldn't bring myself to admit that I was a librarian." To which a waggish member of the group inquired, "Did you tell him you were a bookkeeper—or a 'bookie'?"

We have established ourselves as being worthy of governmental support. The public is voting approval of bond issues for libraries at a time when similar plebecites for the schools are constantly going down to defeat. Perhaps the cynic would reply that the latter is because school children can't vote, but the children are heavy users of the library, too.

Losing our lead time

We cannot afford to rest on such laurels as we may have. We must face the unpleasant fact that, except for some rather dramatic advances in our professional technology, librarianship is basically much the same as it was in the days of Dewey, Cutter, Bowker, and their contemporaries. But theirs was a relatively complacent and comfortable world. Today, in our race against disaster we are, as Mihajlo Mesarovic has reported to the Club of Rome, losing our lead time, and mankind does stand at the crossroads. Fortunately, there seem to be some options open to us, but if they are to be translated into effective and constructive action they will require access to our total store of recorded knowledge, and access to recorded knowledge is the librarian's business. The founding fathers saw the library as essential to democracy; now it is essential to the survival of the world. In National Library Week we frittered away, in sentimental trivia about the joys of reading, a real opportunity to enlighten the public about the importance of recorded knowledge-information to human survival. Mankind can "invent the future," to use Dennis Gabor's phrase, if it will but master the record and make the sacrifices that it dictates. Librarianship, like much of education, has lost its sense of priorities. If we do not find our way, the next century will be far more difficult than the last.

THE EXPERIENCE OF KNOWLEDGE
Essays on American Education

By John Fentress Gardner

John Gardner's practical yet far-reaching proposals for the renewal of education are based on 25 years teaching and administrative experience. They call for a new attitude toward knowledge itself:

"As much as we put into the act of knowing, that much we shall get out of the reality known. If we fully understand this axiom, we shall understand why it is absolutely necessary, even from the viewpoint of a complete and correct science, for the artistic sense of a person, for his moral sense as well—for his whole will and feeling—to be used in the experience of knowledge."

MAN: THE BRIDGE BETWEEN TWO WORLDS

By Franz E. Winkler

Dr. Winkler shows how true self-knowledge emerges from an equilibrium between analytical intellect and comprehending intuition. He writes:

"The only force that can break the fall of human consciousness and make it gain its goal intact, is the uplifting power of intuition. This power was throttled to speed the journey; now it must be revived, or the journey will end in disaster."

Karl Stern, in The New York Times Book Review, said, "Here is a practicing physician who . . . makes a plea for a new humanism. And that plea comes through."

LJ:LETTERS

Craig who? Right on Wray and Josey!

James E. Crayton
Library Resources Advisor, Pasadena City College Library, Pasadena, California:

As I read Craig Robinson's recent rebuttal (LJ, October 1, 1975, p. 1748) to E. J. Josey's "Can Library Affirmative Action Succeed?" (LJ, January 1, 1975, p. 28-31) and Josey's reply to Hanson and Merkovsky (LJ, April 1, 1975, p. 611), I was reminded of the "house niggers" who kept suggesting to the abolitionists and the field hands that "everything was fine." How often does history repeat itself? Robinson is preaching the same nonsense philosophy of the slave era. He erroneously assumes that a commitment to "dialogue" could help. Additionally, one suspects that Robinson wishes to resuscitate the naivete of the "house nigger" who placed his trust and identity in the infinite wisdom and promises of the white men. Ignored is the fact that this country has a history of broken promises and that the limited freedom enjoyed by black men today was not accomplished solely by dialogue. Rather, progress and freedom have come about, largely, as a result of the courage of men like E. J. Josey who dared to hold the mirror and reflect the chasm between America's preachments and her practices.

As for the question of whether Josey speaks for black librarians, I suggest to Robinson that Josey's election as the first president of the ALA Black Caucus indicates he has the support and the confidence of a majority of black librarians.

However, a careful reading of Robinson's apology raises certain questions as to his own commitment and identity. It seem incongruent that a black man in 1975 could seriously champion a strategy which calls for an "examination of black attitudes toward librarianship" as offering some hope that such "might enable white administrators to understand our outlook and frustrations and assist them in making their programs more appealing to minorities as well as instilling a sense of urgency." Does Robinson not know that Hanson and Merkovsky, and any other white administrator, have had years of examination of black attitudes and situations by white men like Myrdal and Monyihan to assist them in making their programs more appealing to minorities? What is needed now is for them to investigate black men like DuBois, Frazier, Franklin, Bennett and Josey, who could assist them in understanding that, given the history of the country, they should be operating from the knowledge that "their" programs are not just "their" programs, but are "our" programs, too.

In the meantime, perhaps Robinson could acquaint himself with some recent history of the black experience with benevolent administrators. Such an acquaintance might serve to disabuse him of the faulty assumptions and inadequate premises from which he operates. Too, "dialogue" with other black librarians, including Josey, might serve to apprise him of some "constructive" approaches to the problems of minority librarians as envisioned by concerned black librarians.

In addition, he should get involved in the region, state, and national library organizations and discover the issues of the '70s. Either Robinson is a newcomer to the state or he is using a pen name. Whodunit?

Robert L. Wright
Lecturer, Graduate School of Library and Information Sciences, University of Pittsburgh:

In sympathy for Craig Robinson, "black librarian," I am all the more "disturbed and appalled" that Robinson seems to have totally distorted thoughts on why he and too many other minority librarians, as yet, "have not been as successful in the profession as the two of them"—i.e. Josey and Haro. But then it appears that Robinson is not to be held responsible for his thoughts (i.e. being the apparent product of a disturbing and appalling environment). Will the real Mr. Robinson please stand—and be counted.

Kister, Berninghausen, Marcuse ???

Eli M. Oboler
University Librarian, Idaho State University, Pocatello:

David Berninghausen's recent thoughtful and stimulating volume, The Flight from Reason, is too important in American librarianship's quest for ratiocinative underpinnings for its actions in the field of intellectual freedom to be given such short shrift as Kenneth Kister's sniffy two-paragraph review in the October 1st LJ (p. 1778). If Kister were writing in 1859 (when both John Stuart Mill's On Liberty and Karl Marx's Critique of Political Economy were published), he would probably have accepted Marx's reverse-Hegelian rhetoric and cavalierly dismissed Mill's Aristotelian logic. Berninghausen is not to be crucified on a hammer-and-sickle because of his presumed great crime of disagreeing with Herbert Marcuse's neo-Marxian "repressive tolerance."

LJ could do worse than to instigate use of its occasional—and always mind-clearing—symposia on the issues raised by Berninghausen's writings and Kister's opinionated bibliocide. I, for one, would gladly participate in a "typewriters at ten paces" print duel with anyone who favors Marcuse over Aristotle, J. S. Mill, or Berninghausen, in this particular area.

Incidentally, I disagree with many of Berninghausen's obiter dicta—but he is a giant of reason compared to Herbert Marcuse's Lilliputian nonsense on the virtues of shouting down opponents who happen to be anti-Marxists. Can Kenneth Kister really have bought the whole Marcusean rationalization for censorship?

Learner's advisors

Susan M. Q. Severtson
Project Director, Resources for Self-Structured Study, Campus Free College, Boston:

The majority of those responding to Gerald Shield's "Another hornblowing bandwagon" (LJ, May 15, 1975, p. 927 and October 1, 1975, p. 1747) were in agreement on the fact that such services are expensive to provide. There also seemed to be a general consensus that the programs were wanted, needed, and valuable to their users. As one who has been associated for over four years with a nationwide learning system based on the Independent Learner process, I am acutely aware of the difficulties involved in the design and implementation of such programs. It has taken CFC five years to build a working system (which it continues to develop) for self-initiated learning. Because of this, most of those associated with the College as Program Advisors (a nationwide network of teachers/professionals/tradesmen) have gained considerable expertise in solving the problems of the Independent Learner.

There is a possible solution for those libraries who would like to provide Independent Learner Services to their patrons, on either a permanent or experimental basis, but lack the staff or resources to devote to it. Several CFC Program Advisors are currently working in various public libraries as volunteers, staffing the "Learners' Advisor" desk. They provide their own expertise to learners, and sometimes spend time training staff to assist in the process. They, in turn, learn from the librarians the complexities of reference work. The tasks of the Reference Librarian and the Program Advisor have many similarities: the initial evaluation of informational (learning) needs, the search and research techniques for their fulfillment, etc. The methods used by each do much to reinforce and strengthen the skills of individual learners/library patrons.

The Cleveland Public Library, for instance, provides a desk and telephone to a local CFC advisor. He provides one free session to any patron and has set up a fee structure for additional sessions. Another CFC advisor served for some time as staff and supervisor on a learning exchange program run by the Amherst Community Resource Center Inc., an independent group housed at the Amherst Public Library in Massachusetts. His work was completely voluntary. Many PAs have expressed interest in working with local libraries, since they are the obvious site from which to reach persons who wish to extend their education. One Program Advisor has proposed a relationship to a library wherein he would call each Wednesday to see if any appointments had been made during the week. He would only come to the library if one or more appointments were made with a learner seeking advising.

Since Program Advisors work quite independently, any arrangements between them and any library would be strictly independent of their relationship to CFC; but all indications are that many would be willing volunteers.

More Gore

Larry Hardesty
Reference Librarian, DePauw University, Greencastle, Indiana:

As Daniel Gore admits in his "The View From the Tower of Babel" (LJ, September 15, p. 1599-1605), what he is telling us is not really new. Almost two generations ago Harvie Branscomb in Teaching with Books told us that a very limited number of titles are used in academic libraries. After 35 years, Branscomb's discussion of the problem is still worth reading.

Perhaps the time has come when we are going to be forced to listen to librarians like Gore. Numerous studies have already indicated that a large portion even a majority, in some studies—of the student body do not use the academic library and with almost no affect on their academic achievement. Now Gore and Trueswell are telling us how few volumes of the book collections of our libraries are used. With the present economic situation and problems in higher education, it does not take any great foresight to see that academic libraries are in trouble.

College and university administrators are being forced to critically examine the policies and programs of their institutions. We would be foolish to think that those "bottomless pits" called libraries are going to excape unscarred. Administrators of academic libraries can no longer manage libraries "by the seat of their pants," but must develop measurable goals and objectives that can be defended. Right now most academic libraries are managed so that it is a frustrating and difficult experience for most students to use them. If libraries were supermarkets, they would have been out of business long ago. (Would you patronize a supermarket in which you could find only about half the groceries you needed?) While it may be argued that libraries serve a nobler purpose than do supermarkets (that might be why they have been getting away with inefficient management), some of the basic principles of operation are the same.

If academic librarians do not admit their problems and try to solve them, the phrase "the library is the heart of the college" will become even emptier than it is now.

Maude E. Brown
Catalog Librarian, Phillips Exeter Academy, Exeter, New Hampshire:

It would be a bitter pill to swallow if Daniel Gore's engineering control for library collections were the only solution to the problem of inactive book collections. If we were to rely upon this engineering solution to keep an active collection, we would end up with a collection that could not meet any standards of quality for either in-school or continuing education. Following this formula we would reduce our organized bodies of accumulated knowledge to very little more than meeting the needs of the student bodies of the open admissions universities.

Unhappily, it is obvious that there are many libraries that would be helped by this solution, but there is another solution that is much more satisfactory for both users of libraries and librarians. Let the librarians build a better mousetrap and bait it with quality cheese! If we want to maintain the library as a basic educational resource, we should build quality into collections and into service. It won't cost any more, but it will mean reassessing priorities and rebudgeting money.

The librarian's solution to the problem of inactive collections should be to reduce the number of titles acquired by concentrating on discriminating selection, improved cataloging, and amplified access through personal guidance. Cataloging departments would rejoice in having more time to tailor both subject and descriptive cataloging to serve library users better. We might even be able to analyze periodical literature in areas not well served by indexes, and to bring out valuable materials of special interest to meet our users particular needs. At present most cataloging departments have no option but to expend the same amount of time and energy to get a poor or unneeded book on the shelf as to get a very good book on the shelf. How uneconomic to do that and then to purge the unused book by what should be an unneeded process.

If many of the unused materials were never acquired, we would be ahead in money saved, time saved, and service to the user improved. I believe there are few people working in libraries who have not wished fervently and often that funds be moved from buying books to buying expertise in book selection, thus buying time for expanded cataloging and processing, and more and better public servicing. Such restructuring of library budgets to support assembling organizing, and maintaining quality collections would be a qualitative, positive, and economic solution before the fact to the problem Gore is trying to solve after the fact.

The shabby heritage

David Picca
Librarian, Miami-Dade Community College, Miami, Florida:

In reaction to John Berry's editorial "The sixty-two day ALA conference" (LJ, August 1975, p.1363), the contention is not whether the conference should be shortened, but rather whether it should be held at all.

"Looking back in anger," what has been accomplished with one hundred of the ALA Conventions? We still haven't produced a Napoleon of the libraries. We still do not have a National Library. We still witness the spectacle of innocent librarians dismissed with astonishing impunity. We still have a sea of unemployed, hardly employed, hardly paid librarians. We still resemble the pitiful cockerels of the ancient fable in which all tried to outcrow each other in greeting the coming of the dawn, which alas, as in our case, never came. We still failed in this past century to project in the mind of the nation an image of power and respectability so as to elicit the same prestige and admiration enjoyed by doctors, teachers, lawyers, etc., etc. We still failed to present ourselves as a solid political block of voters which would have placed us in a position of dictating our own views and our own interests. We still seem to be engulfed in such a degree of national insignificance that this country, mind you, just on the eve of our Centennial, subjected us to the humiliating and mortifying affront of appointing "a pagan to the throne" of the Library of Congress, which is tantamount to saying to us all that our world of professionally and intellectually sterile and impotent mules needed a horse (stud) to achieve (pro)creation.

Oh, the shabby heritage which the ALA is passing on to the second century (of its existence)!! Mondo cane!!

I&R, outside time-worn practice

Dan A. Newton
Center Manager, Rock Information Service, Beloit, Wisconsin:

Further comment is necessary on the topic of information and referral services and the role of libraries ("Free Information and IIA," LJ, May 1, 1975, p. 795 and "Information Power Struggle," LJ, August 1975, p.1359). As manager of the Rock Information Service, which was attacked by Vail Deale in his letter, I feel there were several misrepresentations, either unintentional or deliberate, that need clarification if the topic is to be viewed objectively.

The Rock Information Service is, first of all, not a commercial venture as implied and does not charge for its services. It is, in fact, a public, nonprofit sister agency to the Wisconsin Information Service, sponsored by the Madison Public Library and praised by Deale. Both these and other comparable centers were established throughout the state in 1972 by a federal grant from HEW to provide consistent I&R services to the general population using public funds channeled through a variety of public service organizations such as Rock County Department of Social Services, Madison Public Library, Community Action Programs, Social Security Administration, United Way, etc.—the purpose being to test the very question of which agency is best suited to administer such a program.

These centers utilize a computer-based network to inventory all existing human service resources in a given area—location, eligibility, program components, to document duplication or lack of needed services, and to coordinate with the service providers to improve the total system on an ongoing basis. This is a type of program which libraries seem reluctant to provide although the Madison site proves the feasibility of this association. In Rock County, ironically, the Rock Information Service has the total cooperation of the Rock County Library System and its six participating local public libraries, and, incidentally, includes Deale's own base, Beloit College, among its cooperating resource agencies.

The attempt, through advertising and community involvement, has been to take accessibility to the people, rather than to remain aloof within the "stacks" of traditional reference procedures, and to increase public understanding of and participation in a myriad of public and private welfare programs.

This is not a usurpation of a valid library function by commercial opportunists, but rather a dynamic movement nationwide through the National Alliance of Information and Referral Services, a federation of I&R providers, many of them libraries, to develop and sustain a communitywide utilization of resources in an efficient and economical manner. If Deale or others feel threatened by the evolution of wider programs that reach outside time-worn library practice, they might well ask if it isn't time to reassess that practice and keep pace with the changing needs of society.

ALA vs. ALA early bird

Wayne A. Wiegand
College Librarian, Urbana College, Urbana, Ohio:

It can only happen once in a lifetime! On Monday morning, September 15, 1975, this writer arose at 6:00 A.M.) to apply the finishing touches to an historical vignette he had tentatively entitled "The 'Second' American Library Association." Source material for the vignette had been gathered on a summer research trip to the ALA Archives at the University of Illinois which had been funded through the 1975 Herbert Putnam Award. The writer found the incident amusing, thought others would also, and so attacked the task of writing with scholarly exuberance.

At 10:15 a.m., September 15, 1975, the writer retrieved his daily mail after a committee meeting and opened the newly arrived September 15, 1975, issue of LJ to pages 1606 and 1607. There he found Professor Thomison's admirable treatment of the same subject matter which the writer had four hours earlier completed for what he hoped would be publication credit. Needless to say, his heart sank to his shoes. Hopefully, such incidents can only happen once in a lifetime, if only for the sake of arresting cardiac strain.

Out of frustration I offer two more details—one a correction, the other an observation. First, Carr decided to take the Nason matter to the ALA Executive Board before he even contacted the Kentucky entrepreneur. Second, Carr did reply to Nason's last letter, but it did not include a stamp.

Congratulations anyway, Dennis! In this case the early bird (do you get up before 6:00 A.M.?) did get the worm.

Congress Investigates 1792-1974

A brand-new, one-volume abridgement of the original five-volume work!

The roster of people, events, investigations and ideologies associated with Congressional investigatory committees reads like a dramatic textbook on the major themes of American history. And beneath the confrontations and disclosures lay the gnawing questions which their activities raise in regard to the Constitution, the Courts, the Presidency, and the people.

The 5-volume Congress Investigates: A Documented History 1792-1974 was the first comprehensive, scholarly, fully-documented work on this important subject, consisting of in-depth essays by outstanding scholars on 29 historically significant investigations, and hundreds of related documents.

Now the distinguished editors of that set—Arthur M. Schlesinger, Jr. and Roger Bruns—have selected 16 of the most important essays and reproduced them in their entirety for this one-volume abridged edition.

St. Clair's Defeat, 1792
Indian Rations and Sam Houston's Trial, 1832
The Covode Committee, 1860
The Conduct of the War, 1861
Joint Committee on Reconstruction, 1865
Andrew Johnson's Impeachment, 1867
The Pujo Committee, 1912
Teapot Dome, 1924
The Pecora Wall Street Expose, 1934
The Nye Munitions Committee, 1934
The Dies Committee, 1938
The Truman Committee, 1941
The Kefauver Committee, 1950
The MacArthur Inquiry, 1951
The McCarthy Era, 1954
The Watergate Inquiry, 1973.

Each essay contains a bibliography and a listing of important documents. Professor Schlesinger has contributed an in-depth introductory essay. A comprehensive index rounds out the work.

6x9. 507 pgs. LC 75-28106.
ISBN 0-8352-0864-8. $15.95.

For the full sweep of the 29 investigations, and the hundreds of documents, get the 5-volume set!

In addition to 13 more probing, analytical essays, Congress Investigates: A Documented History 1792-1974 presents hundreds of documents, some in their entirety and some excerpted. They were gleaned from private collections, printed speeches and Congressional documents; retrieved from previously unpublished Congressional records, newspapers and contemporary articles.

6x9. 4,103 pages. LC 74-34005.
ISBN 0-8352-0795-1. $150 the set.

NCLIS: accountable to whom?

Among the "Accursed Questions, 1975" that we listed in our first editorial last year (LJ, January 1, 1975, p. 9) was the "impending crisis of library credibility . . ." that we saw as fundamental to library funding problems in the year or years ahead. A part of our concern then, as it is now, was the fact that in the chaos of Watergate, and the overt hostility of both the Nixon and Ford Administrations to federal aid for education and libraries, and the resulting battles between a Democratic Congress and a Republican administration, library legislation was losing out. It is not so much a lack of leaders or leadership in Washington (as the December 1975 issue of American Libraries documents so fully) as it is an inability on the part of that leadership to determine just what approaches to the Congress might succeed, and which will eventually "get by" a hostile President.

At this writing there appear to be three potential sources of library legislative leadership, currently more in agreement than not, that are emerging on Capitol Hill. Still strong, and still fighting hard, is the ALA Washington Office, energetically pursuing the Association's position on federal aid (such as the extension of LSCA recently voted out of John Brademas' Subcommittee on Select Education in the House), copyright, and, of course, its own favorite dream, a 1977 White House Conference on Libraries.

New to the library forces on Capitol Hill is Daniel Boorstin, the Librarian of Congress. The word is out in Washington that Boorstin has friends in high Congressional places, and that it may have been his personal influence that saved the Madison Building for the Library of Congress.

Now that their "Toward a National Program . . ." is published, and has been adopted by several library and information constituencies, the National Committee on Libraries and Information Science is apparently in the process of conversion from a high-level study group to an action-oriented legislative arm. The problem with NCLIS is that we are not yet sure to which library body that arm is connected.

Back in September NCLIS issued a "strongly worded" (their words) resolution supporting the extension of the Library Services and Construction Act. Among those strong words are the following: "Revise the Act to ensure that federal funds will not be substituted for state funds . . . Provide a limitation on expenditures by State Library Agencies of 10 percent for administrative purposes . . . Assurance of an equitable distribution of LSCA, Title I, funds to support the strengthening of urban public libraries . . . ." The Commission also asked for administrative provisions in the Act to stimulate and require state and local support, merger of Title III of LSCA with the Library Partnership Act to further the development of systems and networks of all types of libraries, and a revision of funding rules to allow "forward funding" to remove the uncertainty, late allocations, and other problems that have cropped up because of difficulty of knowing whether and when LSCA funds would be forthcoming. These are excellent goals for LSCA.

NCLIS also jumped into the fray over the Madison Building—coming down squarely on the side of retaining that new structure for a badly squeezed Library of Congress.

From this, and many other noises, it seems clear that NCLIS is beginning to speak with authority (presumed or otherwise) on library issues at the federal level. It was, after all, the mission of NCLIS to "advise the President and Congress on the implementation of National policy . . . ." While the American Libraries writer wrote NCLIS off as "a catalyst," deserving only about a page in its multipaged report, the Commission evidently sees itself as the leader of the library troops of America as they march into the utopian network of the future.

As long as the goals of libraries and those of NCLIS are alike (we hear very little about copyright from the NCLIS offices, except the usual plea for solutions), this new force in the lobbying arena will surely be as welcome as any other strong voice for good. But when funds for more studies to prove out the national network, or for money to begin its implementation, are requested, and must compete with some of the categorical aid that libraries so badly need, there could be conflict. Even that would be acceptable if the full spectrum of library constituencies could require NCLIS accountability the way ALA members can from their Washington office. But NCLIS, to quote the law which created it, is "an independent agency within the executive branch . . . ."

Before we accept the well-intentioned leadership of such an agency, we'd better be sure we can influence the results. After all, we haven't done too well with the executive branch theses last few years. John Berry

METRO security seminar: fire, crime & insurance

The New York Metropolitan Reference and Research Library recently held an all-day seminar on library security: the 100-odd librarians who came to City University of New York's Graduate Center for the meet were advised by William Kelley (New York City Crime Prevention Section) that the development of concrete security policies is essential. He urged library directors to schedule regular sessions with staffers to air security problems and set procedures for dealing with them, and also suggested that libraries take a harder line with disorderly persons—filing official complaints against them when police are called in and taking second offenders to court. (At a different meeting, LJ learned that a few libraries are having trouble handling mentally ill veterans wandering in from nearby VA hospitals—another case of new social problems triggering new security problems.)

Said Kelley, don't overspend on security, but size up your security problem, and then decide what extras (like closed circuit TV and alarm systems) are necessary to back up such basics as adequate locks, burglar-proof doors, and lighting. During hours of service, the reception area can serve as a checkpoint for stopping people likely to cause trouble; some library areas can be blocked off by means of locked doors; cash (for overdues) should be kept out of sight, and larger amounts of cash should be locked in a safe (preferably off library premises).

High intensity lighting and mirrors, suggested Kelly, can cut down crime in little used areas. He urged libraries to have a say in the hiring of guards (non-uniformed guards were suggested as extra protection if rape or physical assault is a problem) and to counter "employee dishonesty," by paying more attention to hiring and training practices. Libraries were also told to upgrade their inventory procedures (which are nonexistent in many because of the budget crunch): their inability to pinpoint losses was cited as one reason police can't provide more assistance in cutting down theft, much of which goes undetected. The posting of lost items was suggested especially in the university setting. Some New York librarians voiced the fear, however, that publicizing security problems only serves to encourage thieves and vandals.

Fire prevention

Lt. Sattilarro of New York's Fire Department observed that stacked, open tiers (a design once favored by architects) can become chimneys if fire strikes. To cut down on fire risk, he urged self-closing fireproof doors and appropriate extinguishers in rooms holding heating systems, electrical plants, and painting and binding facilities; all such rooms should be regularly cleared of rubbish. Sattillaro noted that about 75 percent of all fires result from a failure to observe such common sense precautions; another 23 percent are accidental; and two percent are incendiary (but arson is on the upswing, and even a rank amateur can set a blaze causing astronomical damage). He urged library management to develop a concrete fire plan, designate a fire brigade to get people out, communicate an alarm (which should be relayed directly to fire prevention headquarters), and confine the fire by shutting doors. Safety stairs are useless (and can become death traps) if any door is open.

Suggested by Sattilarro as the best protection is a sprinkler system—one equipped with an early warning device and a communications line to either the fire department or a fire alert firm. Responding to criticism from the audience about the threat of sprinkler water damage, he argued that sprinkler systems won't go off unless the temperature reaches 165 degrees, and they can be protected from vandals (who might try setting them off with matches) by means of a recessed installation or special cages.

Safety precautions

Thomas Lynskey (Aetna Casualty and Surety Company) urged libraries to make sure stairways have treading, handrails, and adequate lighting; to put higher railings around mezzanines; to block spiral staircases without adequate clearance; and to mark glass doors. Compact moveable shelving, he observed, can be risky: precautions should be taken lest someone get trapped inside when they're closed.

Adequate library insurance

Richard Kenneway of Aetna cautioned that a Comprehensive General Liability Policy is not enough: the policy covers most injuries sustained in the library, but additional policies or endorsements are needed to cover such things as personal injury (libel, false arrest, or wrongful eviction); leased buildings; and programming events held outside the library proper (especially where liquor is available). Libraries must also protect themselves from suits resulting from the negligence of any contractor.

Kenneway contended that "all risk" insurance is inadequate: he urged a special multi-peril policy plus special coverage for exhibits and art holdings; software, film, and print catalogs or shelf lists; leased property; mobile libraries; and any property being shipped.

Staff & service cuts foreseen by academic librarians

Academic libraries will have to reduce their use of professional librarians, demand heavier work loads of all staff members, cut acquisitions, and reduce the quality of cataloging, agreed many participants at the first meeting of the newly-formed Eastern New York Chapter of the Association of College and Research Libraries, a division of ALA. The meeting was held at the State University of New York at Albany and was presided over by C. James Schmidt, SUNY-Albany Director of Libraries.

Among the individual speakers and their messages: Millicent Abell of Suny-Buffalo urged that library administrations must get tough in cutting back acquisitions and in restricting the use of professional librarians, especially in technical processing. G. Richard Wynn, Vice President of Cedar Crest College of Allentown, Pa., a small, private institution, charted the seemingly inevitable decline in the fortunes of all but the most favored colleges and universities, with falling enrollments and rising costs—and concluded that the library would have to share the difficulties of what might be after all a more normal state of affairs than the past decade of prosperity and expansion.

Hugh Atkinson, Director of Libraries at Ohio State University, suggested the possibility of a return to another kind of normalcy—the decentralization of great academic libraries and the reconstitution of departmental libraries dedicated to specific segments of the academic community and supported directly by whatever portion of a departmental budget its clients would allocate to it. Atkinson foresaw the potential savings to be realized from the dismantling of an essentially dysfunctional administrative apparatus, and the values to be gained by the existence of librarians in "tribes" of limited size. The decentralization, he emphasized, would be made possible by the existence of the "electronic protocols" that will standardize the channels of communication between librarians and facilitate complete access to information, even for a small library unit.

Fire & flood bulletin: New England libraries hit

Recent reports of vandalism at the New England Deposit Library, a major fire at Smith College, and water damage at Harvard's Loeb Library indicate that library security is a growing problem.

• Arson in New England: Vandals got to the New England Deposit Library, setting its front door ablaze by forcing burning paper through the letter slot. Attendants at the nearby Harvard Stadium parking lot alerted the fire department. Fearing another assault by vandals, Assistant University Librarian for Building Planning Robert Walsh tried to get carpenters to board up the burned-out entrance, and after a six-hour wait he finally did the job himself.

• Smith College's fire loss: A fire which broke out in the reference room has caused damage estimated at $275,000 in books and fire damage to the Smith College library itself. The losses are covered by insurance.

• Water damage at Harvard: Harvard's Loeb Library collection sustained water damage when a second floor leak seeped down to the lower levels overnight. Doris Freitag, consultant for Conservation of Library Materials, got a salvage effort going—drying out the books under fans; only three volumes were lost.

• Fire evacuation tips: Libraries concerned about getting people out of a building safely in case of fire should get a copy of People Care During a Fire Emergency, Psychological Aspects, 1975. The book, which examines the psychological impact of alarm and evacuation tech-

Warning to New York trustees: threat of legal liability

The New York State Association of Library Boards met November 22 at the Americana Hotel in New York City to hear lawyers warn them of the legal responsibilities and potential liability inherent in serving as a library trustee. The session, chaired by the group's newly elected President, Stephen Oppenheim, was part of the New York Library Association Convention.

In a frightening replay of remarks he made to trustees at last summer's ALA Conference, main speaker William W. Esseks (newly elected vice president of the group) explained that "the law of libraries is dormant" and that library trustees would thus probably be subject to laws affecting other kinds of governing boards. Esseks pointed out areas of possible liability to the library trustee mostly the investment of library funds.

Said Esseks, trustees may be required to make up losses from investments out of their own pocket if the institution loses in an investment. When funds for different purposes are "comingled"—mixed together for operating or investment use—the danger of liability is greater. While noting that certain investments are legal, Esseks still warned that a trustee may be liable to criminal penalties for some investments even if the institution makes money on such.

The Long Island attorney also warned trustees of the dangers of depositing library funds in local banks. "Long Island has had two bank failures recently," he noted, suggesting that deposits be limited to $40,000—the maximum covered by deposit insurance. As a further precaution, Esseks suggested that boards borrow money from their library's savings bank, so that in the event of a bank's failure, they can withhold repayment of any loan until deposits are covered.

Obscenity liability

Esseks pointed out that, with the promulgation by the U.S. Supreme Court of regional and local tests for obscenity, trustees in libraries attached to networks may be subject to greater liability under censorship law than before. If, for instance, a library borrows a book from another library in a system, the book may be adjudged not obscene in the lending community but could still be declared illegal in the borrowing locality.

After detailing other areas of trustee jeopardy and citing law and case material from various states, Esseks then suggested methods by which trustees could protect themselves. "A Board must have rules and regulations to cover every eventuality . . . They should write by-laws for each situation . . . And once you have rules or policies, make sure you follow them."

Basic guidelines

For the alarmed trustees Esseks offered a list of basic rules of board membership: attend meetings or quit; be sure to have operating committees; remove trustees from the Board who don't attend; hire a good lawyer, preferably not a board member; require independent outside audits of the institution's funding and business books; ask the municipality to audit the library's books; ask for bids for "everything in sight" that you want to purchase; make sure you hold public hearings; limit tenure on the board, make it short, "no more than six years"; vote "no" when you're doubtful; check the minutes of board meetings to be sure your votes are recorded; try to get trustees who won't work to quit the board; and don't tolerate any conflict of interest.

Esseks detailed his reasons for many of his suggestions: on the question of voting, he pointed out that trustees' liability may indeed be determined by how they vote on certain board actions. "Absence from the meeting is no excuse," he stated, suggesting that trustees should send a certified letter to the board secretary recording their votes on issues that were decided in their absence.

Finally, returning to fiscal dangers, Esseks said: "There is a reasonable possibility that certain state funds will not be forthcoming on schedule . . . borrowing will become more difficult . . . contracts can't be abrogated . . . so boards must plan their borrowing, and decide in advance who they will repay first . . . "

The meeting was attended by about 50 of the Association's 3000 members, most of whom were found in deep discussion about the implications of Essek's remarks after it was over.

Research moderators for ALA 1976

ALA's Library Research Round Table has sent out a call for moderators and papers for its planned four-part Research Forum Series, scheduled during ALA's July 18-24 Centennial Conference. Among the topics to be covered: methodologies for investigating library networks; interactive information retrieval; and performance measures. Volunteers are urged to contact, by February 1, Robert W. Burns, Jr., Assistant Director for Research, William E. Morgan Library, Colorado State University, Fort Collins, Colo. 80821, or call him at (303) 491-5911.

Another NEH "Learning Library": Writing in Chicago

The National Endowment for the Humanities kicked off an impressive multi-educational venture two years back at the Boston Public Library with its first "NEH Learning Library"; the foundation has put up another grant ($282,342) for a similar three-year public learning program at the Chicago Public Library. Where the Massachusetts projects aims to give Bostonians a perspective on the overall history and culture of their city, the Chicago "Learning Library" program will focus on "Writing in Chicago."

The CPL program consists basically of a free weekly series "open to the public to learn about the city's colorful literary and cultural history." Area residents can attend fulltime or just take in one or two of the many lectures, films, individual study guide sessions, or interpretive dance and drama programs. If an agreement is worked out with the City Colleges of Chicago, participants will also be able to earn academic credit.

Each year both a Writer in Residence and a Scholar in Residence will be named to oversee programming for each year's specific theme. This year it's Chicago and its Literature in Retrospect, to be followed next year by Literary Perspective on the Urban Experience in Chicago, and finally Contemporary Chicago Writers and Their Works. Each year's programming will culminate with a three-day literary festival, featuring dramatic performances, poetry readings, AV presentations, and informal talks.

In addition to the main library program (to be run every Tuesday evening from 6:30 to 8:00 P.M.) two branch libraries will offer Saturday afternoon programs on such things as Chicago artistic movements and literary developments. The CPL program director is Stephen Kochoff.

Senter named President of Xerox Education Div.

William J. Senter has been appointed President and General Manager of Xerox Education Division of Xerox Corp. Included in the division are the R. R. Bowker Company, New York, N.Y.; Xerox University Microfilms, Ann Arbor, Mich.; Ginn and Company, Lexington, Mass.; Xerox Learning Systems, Stamford, Conn.; Xerox Education Publications, Middletown, Conn.; and Unipub, New York, N.Y. as well as other domestic and international subsidiaries.

Senter was previously Vice President, Development and Planning, of the Xerox Education Group. For the past year, he has been Vice President of the Information Publishing Group of XEG and President of the R. R. Bowker Company.

Asleson takes the helm at R.R. Bowker

Robert F. Asleson, formerly President of Xerox/University Microfilms (Ann Arbor, Michigan), has been appointed President of R. R. Bowker, succeeding William Senter, who now heads up Xerox Education Division. Asleson has been with Xerox since 1961, when he was named Assistant to the President. In 1964, he took the post of Marketing Manager at University Microfilms, later advancing to Vice President Operations and General Manager. He was appointed President of UM in 1969.

Asleson is also on the Board of Directors of the National Microfilm Association.

NYLA nonpros urge creation of support staff unit

At its annual meet in New York City, the New York Library Association was urged to create a special association unit for library support staff—one which would be called Administrative, Clerical, and Support Staff (ACSS). The pros and cons of providing representation within NYLA for public and college support staff were discussed at a well-attended meeting scheduled by the nearly year-old ACSS committee.

Former NYLA President Stanley Ransom took a conservative stance: he urged nonpros to work to "gradually infiltrate" the organization, but he warned them not to expect to get conference program time "for two or three years." The nonpro, he asserted, must respect the established "division of labor," remaining subordinate to degree-carrying professionals.

Patsy Gaven, formerly director of the Fairbanks, Alaska, North Star Borough Library, took an aggressive position, urging nonpros to mobilize at the local level, to put the heat on library directors until they get action, to demand conformance with guidelines set forth in ALA's Personnel Utilization in Libraries, and to get to the "aristocrats of the profession" as well. Countering Ransom's position on respecting pro status, she contended that some nonpros are better qualified than professional librarians (about ten attendees said they're now doing professional-level work). Responding to pessimism voiced by nonpros who spoke of the futility of bucking the top brass and unions (which were blamed for restricting job mobility) Gaven urged them to fight back, demanding more job flexibility and better union contracts.

Many nonpros—at the public and university library level—spoke of a "master-slave mentality" that they feel dominates the profession and of the stiff resistance they've encountered in getting their needs addressed. One example of how the slumping economy is helping to keep nonpros down: school librarians fearful of their own job security barred support staff from meetings of the Orange County (N.Y.) School Libraries Association; the Orange Sullivan Public Library Association, however, decided to let them in.

The nine-strong ACSS committee (headed up by Eileen Hickson of the Port Washington Public Library) recruited more new members at the NYLA conference. It plans to get news of nonpro concerns into the library press and NYLA's Bulletin. Its immediate target: getting a whole day of conference time next year—one focusing on such things as interaction with library directors, participative management, reference service, children's service, and a social.

Ill. trustees must be bonded

A new state law requires bonding for custodians of public library funds in Illinois townships, cities, villages, and towns of 50,000 or less. The bond must be no less than 50 percent of the annual tax collected for the library, and the board treasurer can be designated as the one to be bonded.

THE LIBRARY DOLLAR

Trouble in Suffolk & Nassau: financial crises loom

Two Long Island, New York library systems were in financial trouble at year's end, but for different reasons: the Suffolk Cooperative Library System is trying desperately to erase a long-standing operating deficit resulting from an excess of commitments over income; the neighboring Nassau Library System is fighting an attempt by the county to pull back its $300,000 annual subsidy—on the grounds that the system has a huge cash reserve which it could draw on.

Having been refused aid by both the Suffolk county administration and the Nassau County Library System, the bankrupt Suffolk County Library System laid off most (48) of its staff, leaving in charge only four professionals and a handful of nonprofessionals. Suffolk's troubles, charge its critics, stem from overspending and living off high-interest, short-term loans, instead of trying to erase its deficit, and build up an operating reserve—as did its sister system. Its move to cut costs and staff to the bare minimum evidently worked to a certain degree: the Long Island Trust Company gave the system a $350,000 loan (annual interest 9¾ percent) to cover outstanding bills as well as salary payments jeopardized by default. Long Island Trust has given Suffolk an $800,000 line of credit, which will provide the system with a regular cash flow until receipt of $1.1 million in state aid in 1976.

Suffolk reports it is now working on a "long range plan of library services and expense accountability." Some system services (film service and book delivery) will be resumed, but most will be curtailed until a new board (as ordered by the State Legislature) takes over this month. Some board members reportedly seek the ouster of Director Jansen.

The Nassau County Library System has mounted a massive campaign aimed at getting library people, legislators, and residents to get the county government to rescind its decision to hold back the county's annual subsidy of $300,000. The county had decided to pull back when it learned that Nassau had built up a "reserve operating fund" totalling some $1.3 million. The system contends that the fund enables it to avoid paying heavy interest charges for loans to pay operating bills; but Nassau County officials call it a budget "surplus." The Nassau system contends that the loss of the county payment will reduce annual income by one-sixth and could sharply curtail services. At last report, prospects for getting the subsidy were grim.

Queens (N.Y.) fires staff; branch closings stalled

Faced with another city-ordered budget cutback of $765,000, New York's Queens Borough Public Library, reports Director Milton Byam, has fired another 56 library staffers instead of his original plan to meet the cutback by shutting down 11 branch libraries—an action prevented by a lawsuit filed against QBPL by the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People. According to 1970 census figures, three of the branches slated for closing serve predominantly black communities; another two serve communities where blacks make up from 55 to 37 percent of the total population.

Sizing up the library's budget plight, Byam reported that Queens Borough, which has already been cut back nearly $3 million since June of 1974, must now chop its budget by another eight percent. The library, which loses about 100 positions a year by attrition, had already fired 20 full-time and 176 part-time staff members; it must now fire another 56 full timers—all of whom have gone without wage increases since December 1974. Decrying the new staff cutbacks as "a pity," Byam backed his "dedicated and productive staff," noting that they "do not strike or take job actions although paid at lower rates than other City employees." The present staff, he emphasized, is cut back to where it was 11 years ago, despite the addition to its load of seven new libraries and a central library nearly tripled in size, and massive expansions in programming and hours of service. Staff cutbacks, he contended, will force Queens Borough to return federal funds originally granted for the establishment of "portabranches" and kiosks in still unserved areas in Queens.

Before the NAACP stepped in, Byam had decided to cut back by closing the 11 least economical branches—including several where per item book circulation was costing up to $4 and circulation was slipping down. The NAACP charged, however, that the choice of branches was discriminatory. Byam had proposed to continue service to these areas via a book mail service, a bookmobile, and a bus loop providing free transportation to nearby branches and Central.

While contending that his proposed closings were based on sound economic considerations, Byam warned that "a real danger exists that this is only the first wave" of cuts that could eventually close the doors of the Queens Borough Central Library itself.

Library $$ gains reported by W. Va., Tulsa, & Texas

Despite the limping economy, libraries in some areas are winning out in the battle for federal and local funding. West Virginia got Public Works money for more "instant libraries"; two Texas libraries won out in giant building referendums; and Tulsa will be able to keep open two branch libraries that had been threatened with shutdown. Among the rosy budget reports to come to LJ:

- $$ for more W. Va. "instant libraries": Frederick Glazer of the West Virginia State Library Commission reports that new funding ($126,000 from Title X of the Public Works and Economic Development Act) will pay for the labor costs involved in setting up ten more "instant libraries"—bringing the state's total to 27. Glazer worked via the Appalachian Regional Commission to get the funding.

- Texas votes for libraries: Richard Waters of the Dallas Public Library reports that voters favored by a two-to-one margin a giant $149.8 million capital improvements referendum—$2.9 million of which is earmarked for libraries. Dallas will use the money to build its 18th branch library, to replace a storefront with a permanent facility, and to complete the design work on its planned downtown central research library. Austin voters, he reports, nixed many propositions in the city's multipurpose $205 million referendum, but okayed $1.9 million for expansion of the new central library. But Fort Worth voters rejected a referendum proposition that would have provided money for library building.

- Sunshine in Tulsa: The Tulsa City-County Library System reports that an unexpected $131,000 bonus in tax revenue plus community pressure will keep open two branch libraries (both still needing extensive repair work) that had been threatened with shutdown. Up for a statewide vote in November of 1976 is a proposal that will enable communities across the state to vote for increased tax support; it would double the maximum millage (earmarked for libraries by communities) from two to four mills.

• Zooming circulation & book $$: C. David Warren of the Cumberland County Public Library (Fayetteville, North Carolina) reports that a doubled book budget for 1975-76 follows a 44 percent boost in circulation.

• CETA work crews for Rochester: New York's Rochester Public Library reports that it won Comprehensive Training and Employment Act funding to pay work crews now painting and repairing several branches and Central.

Denver cutbacks, $$ threats, Pa. library nixed

Recent reports from libraries indicate the impact of the economy crunch: the Denver Public Library had to work out with city fathers a compromise on just what services would be cut; one New York county has threatened to cut library support in order to offset rising welfare costs; and one Pennsylvania county nixed a permanent library despite the impressive record of a demonstration mobile library. In Oklahoma, the state is trying to equalize county property tax support for libraries, but some forward-looking systems could lose out if a equalization proposal now under consideration goes through.

• Denver wrestles with city hall over cutback priorities: The Denver Public Library's Inkling reports the back-and-forth negotiations between city and library people over what services should be axed. When the city ordered a big budget cutback, DPL suggested the closing of seven storefront libraries. Public outcry prompted the city to nix that proposal and call for cutbacks in Central reference service instead. The library then suggested cutting back all library hours across the board, but the city said no. A compromise was finally worked out: the storefronts will stay open 20 hours a week as "satellites" to larger branches; Sunday service at Main and two bookmobiles will be dropped; and the film center will have to close unless it can pay its own way with a $4 service fee on film borrowing. The Rare Books Room will close; eight community service positions will go, the Conservation Library will be closed (unless a special fund raising committee can raise $45,000 to keep it going until permanent funding can be assured); and the Special Collections Service will be eliminated.

• Welfare jeoparadizes N.Y. library support: Alarmed by mounting welfare bills, Dutchess County legislators have proposed as a bailout measure cutting county support (about $50,000 annually) for public libraries. The impact on libraries could be in the range of five to ten percent budget cutbacks for 1976—something which could add many library staffers to welfare rolls.

• Pennsylvania voters nix permanent library: Despite the phenomenal success of a mobile demonstration library (in its first year, circulation—handled by one librarian and a part-timer—reached 25,000), a permanent facility has been voted down by the residents of this last of all Pennsylvania counties to be without library service. Librarian Charles Paidock, who handled the project for the Conococheague District Library, reports that 60 percent of the voters nixed the Fulton County Library, although "some evidence of unethical campaign practices is slowly being gathered."

• Oklahoma property tax equalization poses a threat: Oklahoma libraries that depend on county property taxes for a substantial chunk of their income are watching with concern present efforts to develop a formula that will provide for statewide equalization of the property tax base. At present, a few counties tax themselves heavily (at a rate of 25 percent of the actual valuation of property), while others tax on a very low percentage of actual value—providing poverty level support to schools and libraries. State aid funds have been supplementing library support in these backward counties—an equalization policy that clearly discriminates against those counties making an effort to provide for adequate library service. Now the State Supreme Court has ruled that valuation must be equalized statewide; the Governor has received the report of a study committee on how to achieve this. If, as a minority report from the study committee suggests, the equalization is achieved by dropping the maximum to 15 percent, such forward-looking systems as Oklahoma County Libraries (which now gets tax revenue at a 20 percent assessment value) could be hit with devastating tax losses. Ironically, counties providing minimum tax support would be under a vague "voluntary" mandate to gradually raise their tax rate, but counties providing property tax support above 15 percent would be compelled to lower their tax rate. Library planners concerned with this statewide support problem should try to get a copy of the November 13 OCL Staff Newsletter. Reverse bias court ruling: Los Angeles Co. loses out

Ruling in a reverse bias suit filed by six white and one Japanese-American library staffers, the Los Angeles Superior Court has found that the Los Angeles County Public Library violated county Civil Service regulations when it promoted a black and a Hispanic who scored lower than the seven in competitive examinations for two positions. The Court has ordered Library Director Carol Moss to rescind the promotions (which were made by former director William Geller while under fire for "discrimination") of Lois Edwards, coordinator of Children's Services, and Elizabeth Smith, regional administrator of LACPL's Region 9 (institutional services). The new appointments, it said, must be made from the original list of 30 persons—with top consideration given to those who scored first, second, and third place on the competitive exams.

The successful Los Angeles County suit could serve to undermine libraries that are attempting to comply with affirmative action goals. Commenting on the case earlier, the attorney for the defendants (Thomas Hunt) noted that "the County will be in the impossible situation of being sued and losing cases when it does not engage in affirmative action, then being sued and losing cases when it does engage in affirmative action." The plaintiffs' attorney (Stephen Silver) had argued that the appointments (which were made when the library was up on charges of discrimination—charges later upheld by the California Fair Employment Practices Commission) represented unconstitutional discrimination denying his highly qualified clients—a few of whom are no longer with the library—equal protection of the law by preventing their advancement solely because of their skin color.

Minnesota Library Assn. urged to avoid union role

The Minnesota Library Association, which had under consideration a new role as collective bargaining representative for nonunion library staff in the state, has been urged by its Unions and Bargaining Agent Study Committee (Fran Galt, chairperson) to avoid such a role. In a report appearing in the MLA Newsletter, the committee stated that it was sympathetic to the needs of nonunion personnel and originally favored a union role for MLA—a position backed up by a legal opinion (Friedman and Friedman of Duluth) that such a role would not damage MLA's tax status. ALA has consistently refused to give active support to individual librarians involved in disputes with employers on the grounds that the association would endanger its tax status.

The MLA union study committee noted, however, that further consultations with various agencies revealed hazards in such a course of action. The Minnesota State Mediation Service said that the present makeup of the association—both employers and employees—would make a union role illegal. The committee also noted that under state law MLA does not qualify as either an "employee organization" or a "public employer."

While nixing a union role, the committee said that MLA should "maintain vigilance against any labor abuses anywhere in the state and, where such abuses are discovered, should be responsive in support of the abused through the [MLA] Legal Defense Fund. . . . All members . . . should eagerly show concern and support of any fellow library worker anywhere in the state who suffers unfair job termination or other abuse in his or her employment."

"Library Service Enhancement" aim of LCR program

The Council on Library Resources has announced a new grant program which aims to provide college and university librarians in four-year accredited institutions with an opportunity to develop innovative projects designed to improve the services and increase the use of their libraries. The overall goal, says CLR, is to stimulate "effective involvement of the academic library in the teaching/learning process . . . thus strengthening its educational role as an active participant with classroom faculty."

Applications are to be made jointly by the library director and an experienced staff member with a strong interest in library services. Successful applicants will be relieved of normal duties for the 1976-77 academic year to devote full time, on campus and off, to exploring the needs of the academic community and developing programs which enhance the library's position as an active component of the university.

CLR will put up a maximum of $20,000 to cover salary and benefit costs for each "project librarian"; approximately ten grants will be awarded. No matching funds are required. CLR intends that money saved by participating institutions be used to bring a "beginning professional" into the library to help fill the gap caused by the absence of the project librarian.

The deadline for applications is February 15. Contact: Library Service Enhancement Program, CLR, DuPont Circle, Suite 620, Washington, D.C. 20036.

Conviction of CPL's Newman decried as a "tragedy"

Reacting to the conviction of Chicago Public Library Board President Ralph Newman for his involvement in Nixon's tax fraud, CPL Chief Librarian David Reich has issued a lengthy statement decrying the conviction as "a personal and public tragedy." Reich paid tribute to Newman, noting his service to the city and the library community: he's been CPL board president since 1968 and is also chairman of the Urban Libraries Council.

Newman was scheduled for sentencing January 6 for allegedly "lying and helping former President Nixon to report an illegal $450,000 tax deduction" by backdating the President's gift of his private papers to the government. Similar charges against Nixon's tax lawyer, Frank DeMarco, were dismissed by a Los Angeles court on the grounds that the Watergate scandal prevented him from getting a fair trial.

LC sets guidelines for union recruiters & opponents

The Library of Congress has set down clearcut guidelines on just how far employees and nonemployees can go in either promoting or opposing a staff union at the library. Says LC, employees can't engage in such activities during working hours, and nonemployees must restrict their campaigning to designated areas outside library entrances and in public cafeterias and snack bars controlled by LC.

The library's Labor-Management Relations and Appeals Office will handle up to three mailings to staff members; each will be addressed and set by LC, but postage must be paid in advance by the sponsoring organization or individual.

Growing pains at OCLC detailed at N.Y. meet

The nation's most successful automated bibliographic network to date, the Ohio College Library Center, is right now a confusing mixture of real accomplishment, embarrassing failures to deliver service, and visions of ever greater accomplishments. That seemed to be the upshot of a meeting in late November of one of OCLC's largest groups of clients—the State University at Albany (SUNY) system. The SUNY users group met in New York City during the annual meeting of the New York Library Association.

The real accomplishments of OCLC were clearly acknowledged; despite bugs in the system, catalogers were quick to say that OCLC service is a lot better than previous ways of acquiring catalog cards—and as one participant told LJ, "It still is the only show in town."

But the demonstration terminals in the NYLA exhibit area were shut down during the conference, and the SUNY group were complaining that their home terminals had been more often shut down than operating during the past week. A progressive deterioration in response time of the system has been explained as a result of the overloading of the system with new terminals, and the hope has been held out that the imminent addition of two new Xerox computers would put OCLC back in business.

OCLC Executive Director Fred Kilgour was the object of pointed questioning from the floor: "What are you going to do to improve the quality of OCLC cataloging?" Can't we get better training manuals?" "We have to keep a 'blacklist' of OCLC users whose contributed cataloging is so bad that we can't use it. Is there any way they can be improved?" and "How are we going to justify to our institutions the increased cost of OCLC?" (OCLC has boosted its prices by about 30 percent recently, and the SUNY headquarters has tacked on an additional price increase for its services.) And "What will be the impact on OCLC of Xerox going out of the computer business?" (OCLC uses the Xerox Sigma 9 computer and is at present adding two more to the system.)

But Kilgour held out to the SUNY group the promise of better things to come: the new Sigma 9's, he said, will be working soon and will bring back an average response time of eight seconds. And the sharp drop in Sigma 9 prices caused by its recent abandonment by Xerox will be a blessing in disguise: OCLC will be able to buy parts much cheaper than expected. And OCLC, said Kilgour, doesn't really depend on the computer manufacturer for service—that can all be handled in-house.

By summer's end, said Kilgour, the system will be able to handle 3000 terminals; a new capability for automated check-in of serials "will be ready tomorrow"; the first modules of a new acquisitions system will be ready for testing by next summer; and a new interlibrary loan system will also be available late in 1976. In addition, said Kilgour, talks are being held with the Stanford BALLOTS system, and OCLC users can look forward eventually to being able to tap into the BALLOTS data base.

Kilgour also responded to growing complaints about domination of OCLC by its original user group—Ohio academic libraries. Governance of the system, he admitted, was a serious problem. He said he favored participation by all users equally in decisions affecting the system, and he also looked forward to the day when "this $9 million corporation" will have capable corporate brains on its governing board rather than librarians.

Kilgour also suggested the possibility that OCLC would grow in the future by adding new clients on a one-to-one basis, with the client contracting directly with OCLC for service rather than going through one of the consortia such as NELINET, SOLINET, or SUNY. "SUNY," he pointed out, "has no monopoly on OCLC for New York State."

Cooperation in California: UC joins CLASS consortium

The University of California has joined CLASS—the California Library Authority for Systems and Services—thus giving the neophyte network consortium access to the vital bibliographic resources of the UC libraries, reports State Librarian Ethel Crockett.

The UC Regents will be one of six signatories setting up the new authority, along with designated signatories for the State College system, the Community Colleges, the State Library, and representative signatories from a leading city public library system, a county library system, and a Community College Library District. The combined signatories will form a Joint Powers Authority, a separate legal body including only one librarian as a voting member, the State Librarian. Crockett reports that growing enthusiasm for CLASS seems to signify its future as a powerful element on the California library scene.

OCLC halts expansion: more computer power needed

Responding to growing evidence of badly deteriorating service within the Ohio College Library Center network, Executive Director Frederick Kilgour has told the 750-odd OCLC member libraries that a moratorium will be imposed on new terminals or any expansion of services. Said Kilgour, OCLC will hold back its national expansion efforts until the new computer power now being built into the system is fully operational and devoid of any kinks.

System members had been complaining bitterly about poor response time and instances when the system itself was shut down for hours. Meanwhile, Kilgour continued to report the addition of even more members to the overburdened system and the building in of new and better services.

Until the OCLC system is brought up to snuff, many libraries will be forced to continue trying to use the system at night and on Saturdays. Many of them also face the prospect of taking their turns at being periodically shut off by the system—a procedure referred to as "feathering" of terminals: shutting down the terminals on groups of two or three phone lines for a period of one hour at the same time each day.

Illinois Library Council tries out interstate service

The Illinois Regional Library Council is trying out interstate reciprocal borrowing (starting with Wisconsin) by means of a pilot project for the exchange of "infopass" privileges between IRLC and "libraries, information centers, and councils in any state contiguous with the Council area."

For starters, two Wisconsin cooperatives have signed contracts with IRLC for "infopass" swapping: the Library Council of Metropolitan Milwaukee and the Tri-County Council of Kenosha. Reimbursement for infopass use is to be handled on a net basis between participating councils annually. Beth Hamilton is IRLC Director.

Encyclopedia of German-American Genealogical Research

Here's a long-needed sourcebook on one of America's largest, yet most genealogically neglected ethnic groups. It brings together background data and information on reference tools that American researchers need to trace direct links between Germany, its emigrants, and their American descendants.

Comprised of essays, bibliographies, lists and other data, the Encyclopedia discusses such topics as: German ethnic-religious bodies established in America; published source materials in America such as membership lists and German-language newspapers; published source materials in Germany such as a bibliography of published emigration lists; and many others.

Seven Realities of Library Administration

DON'T get me wrong—I like Likert; I think McGregor is magnificent; I am delighted with Drucker; and I believe Maslow was a master. But in reading their books and articles while reflecting on my own experience, I am reminded of what Cassius said to Brutus, "... the fault, dear Brutus, is not in our stars, but in ourselves."

Any time two or more librarians meet they start telling administrative "horror stories." These stories center not around administrative theories or their violation, but rather around human frailty and the personal idiosyncrasies of people in charge. We seem to continue to conjure up visions of management by objectives, participatory management, management consultants, team building, sensitivity training, group decision making, etc. when organizational problems originate within ourselves

From experience, conversations with other librarians, and reading in library literature I derive seven major problems which are either lost in the jargon of administrative literature or not covered at all. (Tempted to call them the seven deadly sins of library administration, I decided that by doing so I would be committing one.) They are offered as a warning to the novice, as a catharsis to experienced librarians who have not reached administrative positions, and as an exposure to administrators who are tired of prescriptive administrative writing and want to know what we underlings really think.

What goes wrong in most organizations in America? Why do librarians complain so vigorously about their jobs and their libraries? Because they can't participate? Because their bosses are not sensitive to their feelings? Because they are not part of a team? Or perhaps, because they lose sight of their objectives?

Maybe, but the causes go much deeper than that. They originate in our basic beliefs, behavior, habits, and traditions. They grow out of feelings about ourselves and our feelings toward others. Further, the origin of the problems must be attacked before administrative theory can have meaning, before we even construct theories which assume that mature individuals are in administrative positions.

The seven problems

Fear takes first place among organizational problems and has no close rivals. This is fear to demand one's rights; fear to point out a superior's mistakes for fear of reprisal; fear to demand fair treatment; fear to make suggestions lest they will be taken as criticism; fear to propose new ideas and programs; fear to speak out for fear of becoming a target of personal animosity; fear to buck the boss!

Next, but one of the major causes of the first, is our insistence on the legalistic approach over the scientific method in solving problems. We must blame, try, convict, and ultimately humiliate a wrong doer. Americans are "governed by laws not by men," and we are a litigious people. Never mind that the law resembles the Killiloo bird which flies backward because it doesn't give a damn where it's going; it just likes to see where fear, blame, the productivity obsession, expediency, management by crisis, bureaucracy, management by platitude

it's been. Never mind that this law blames instead of solves, punishes instead of corrects, treats all problems as if there is only one variable—the individual human one.

Close behind legalism is the problem of confusing the library, a service organization, with business and industry, production organizations. We borrow their emphasis on efficiency, production (book counts), continuous activity, and statistics. But as a service organization we must be governed by different rules. We have selected the wrong model.

Administrative expediency, the fourth major problem, holds the title for causing anger and frustration, while also devastating morale. Deliver me from the boss who'd rather save himself a little trouble than defend his employees, the boss who gives in to faculty, trustee, or principal rather than defend his employees, the boss who places his personal convenience over the welfare of his employees. (Not to mention the boss who inflates his prestige at the expense of his subordinates.)

Administration by crisis and surprise may not compete with administrative expediency in causing frustration, but it makes up for this lack with the tension and stress it creates. Keep everyone confused, expectant, and nervous; don't plan ahead; let events dictate policy.

Excessive bureaucracy ranks sixth in problems in administrative reality. Make sure that all decisions must slowly climb the administrative hierarchy and just as slowly return. Never mind that the people who handle problems as they arrive at the organization may be the best equipped to solve them. Don't allow horizontal cooperation in an organization. After all, the administrator loses control—the haunting fear of all administrators!

Personnel administration by platitude and fad take last place in this line-up of administrative foibles only because there is no room at the top. Here the boss is supposed to say: "My door is always open," "How's your mother?" "Like your job, don't you?" "This library pays well," as if these pleasantries are a substitute for a sincere concern.

Fear

Fear is a degrading human emotion: it robs one of self-esteem. How can a person maintain self-worth when our religions, our schools, and our employers conspire to belittle and belabor that person with sin, lack of ability, and failures? How can the average American see himself as a valuable person when he or she fears for salvation, for ability to think and write, and for his or her job? How can they maintain confidence in themselves when what they produce is more important than they are? It is as if we take A. H. Maslow's hierarchy of needs—physiological needs, safety needs, social needs, need for self-esteem, and need for self-fulfillment—and say: "We stop at social need; from here the individual must go on alone." Not only do we stop, we make the pilgrim's progress from there more difficult, if not impossible. We don't help employees gain self-esteem; we rob them of it by blaming, fault finding, continually pointing out their mistakes, and, finally, punishing them for offenses.

To get back to administrative reality, one might ask: What does the administrator gain from an investment in fear? (For more on this point I highly recommend W. H. Weiss's article "Breaking the Fear Barrier.")[1] Fearful people seek to defend themselves. They avoid situations which cause fear, then set up defenses. They avoid the fear-creating situation by avoiding the boss. Possible reprimands are avoided by withholding information, by keeping secrets. If this does not work, one resorts to lying. A fearful staff member avoids responsibility for fear of failure and the resulting wrath of a supervisor. Advice is withheld for fear the supervisor will take it as criticism and take revenge. Initiative is avoided for fear the boss will respond, "That's not your job!" These are some of the benefits the boss receives in return for an investment in fear.

But these benefits are more or less passive. What are some of the active benefits to a boss from fear in the organization? The employee creates or joins cliques; he or she gossips to focus attention on others; he or she criticizes; responsibility is avoided; he or she even hides. Not only is cooperation withheld, the association between employee and manager becomes an adversary proceeding. But perhaps worst of all, the worker wishes the worst for the boss, the tormentor, the source of the fear. The next step is active participation in causing the failure of the manager. Quite a return on one's investment!

Fear is usually expressed indirectly. Richard Johnson and William Ouchi quote an American working in a Japanese-owned plant as saying, "Americans will disagree with their boss rarely but violently; the Japanese disagree often but politely."[2] One suspects that Americans slowly overcome their fear and build up their courage to confront the boss. Then for one brief moment they do what they should have been doing politely all along—they inform the boss! But they probably expect to leave their jobs permanently shortly thereafter!

Legalism and blame

"The essence of mental disturbance can be designated in a single word: blaming. If any human being would stop, really stop, blaming himself, others, or unkind fate it would be virtually impmssible for him to be emotionally upset about anything. And you can probably omit 'virtually' from the preceding sentence."[3] Yet blaming is the essence of the legal system! For more on this point see Charles I. Gragg's "Whose Fault Was It?"[4]

The legal approach demands that an individual must be saddled with the total responsibility and must pay for mistakes in money, time, loss of position, belittlement, or loss of self-esteem—in most cases all of these. I know of one librarian who puts price tags on mistakes: S. S. made a $15,000 mistake; M. M. made a $25,000 mistake; D. D. made a $30,000 mistake. No practice is more vicious or better suited to robbing an individual of self-esteem. Only a little less vicious is the common practice of silently recording employee mistakes and then unloading the list in an annual evaluation.

Anyone can think of a host of variables or contributing causes for most problems: lack of training, lack of supervision, confusion originating from on high, overwork, too many diversified duties, etc. Obviously, responsibility must be assigned to a position. However, responsibility should be descriptive, not the basis for blame. This section does not mean that because a problem has many causes, responsibility is cancelled. But even if one insists on the legal approach, contributing causes must be considered if fairness is to be achieved.

In most organizations a primary cause of mistakes is the lack of adequate job descriptions and shifting job descriptions. Employees in many libraries complain vehemently that they are not told clearly what to do. But even if the library provides job descriptions, supervisors change the employee's instructions frequently. The employee does one thing one day but something else the next. One must expect, and accept, the fact that confusion produces mistakes.

Most librarians, however, lack training in writing job descriptions, and too often they include unrelated, even contradictory, duties in a particular position. Also, their expectations of a job may exceed the individual's capacity to perform. Consequently, the employee is unable to manage all the details, but is afraid to admit his incapacity. An administrator must consider these factors before holding an employee responsible for mistakes.

Administrators can write the most lucid job descriptions and still fail to provide proper training. Without such training, blaming an employee for mistakes becomes self-righteous hypocrisy.

The most ironic contributing cause is the employee's desire to please: he tries too hard. Our society instills in every individual the need for acceptance, the need to be liked, the need to gain everyone's approval, especially the boss's. Only the strongest individuals recognize the futility of such an effort and expect some disapproval. When approval is the primary consideration, performance suffers, judgment is clouded by nervousness, and mistakes are invited.

Legalism causes other mischief: it causes us to focus on the past (what happened? who is at fault?), not on the future (what should we do?). If we follow the legal approach, we spend all our time trying to establish the facts; we sift through contradictory evidence and testimony. How and when do we plan for the future? We don't!

Legalism turns every interaction into an adversary one. It solicits charges-counter charges, debate-rebuttal, offense-defense, ad infinitum. An employer accuses the employee; the employee, to save face, denies the charge. This exchange hardly provides a basis for compromise, much less cooperation.

On the other hand, the scientific method calls for one to discover a problem or propose a change, to investigate it, to seek out and test all possible options, and then to apply the best of them. The scientific method looks to the future, but never, never requires personal blame. Human behavior becomes only one of many variables in each situation.

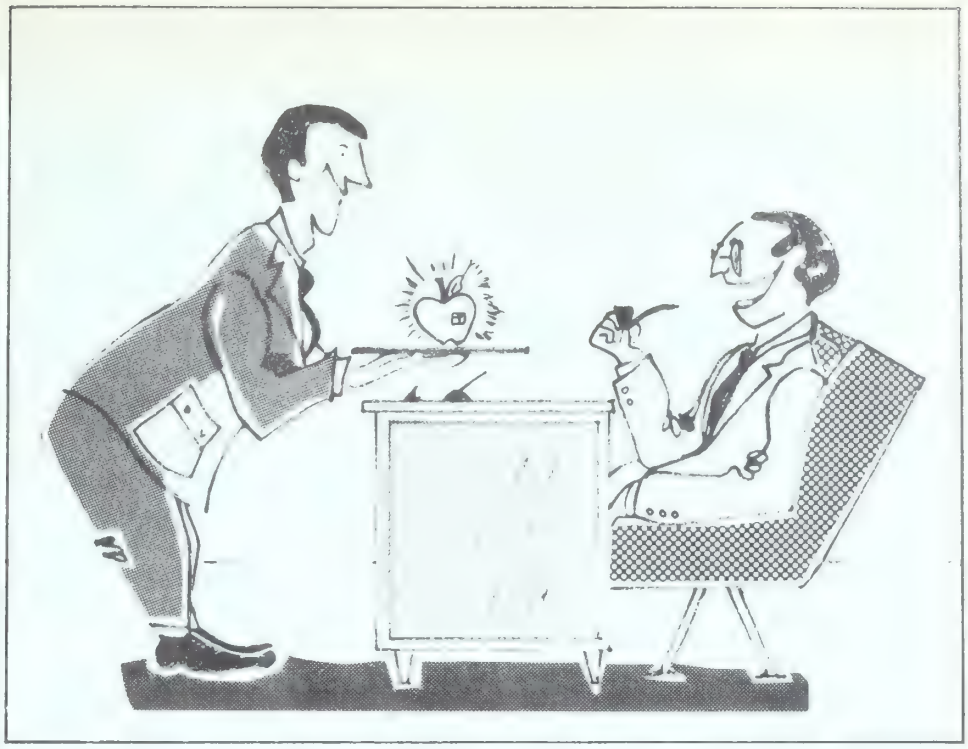
Service vs. production

Peter Drucker, in his book Management, devotes a chapter to discussing the difference between production organizations and service organizations.[5] Librarians have borrowed heavily from business in the past and still do. It is appropriate to review Drucker's distinctions.

Production organizations demand efficiency; service organizations should demand effectiveness, not efficiency. For example, to circulate one "Talking Book" may cost a library $35 while a regular circulation may cost only $1.25. Obviously, a library could improve efficiency, as guaged by unit cost, by dropping the Talking Books program, but if it does so it also lowers its effectiveness. Libraries, as service institutions, should realize that organizations can be efficient while actually being ineffective. In fact, libraries can be efficient while doing the wrong thing, or as Drucker puts it: "Services essential to the fulfillment of the institution's purpose may be slighted or lopped off in the name of efficiency."[6] This is an imminent possibility as institutions reduce library budgets to the minimum.

Without profits as a measure of production, service organizations turn to budgets as a measure of results and performance, according to Drucker. Administrators of service institutions ask for bigger and bigger budgets.

> Being paid out of a budget allocation changes what is meant by performance, or results. Results in the budget-based institution mean a larger budget. Performance is the ability to maintain or to increase one's budget. Results, as the term is commonly understood, that is, contributions to the market or achievement toward goal and objectives, are, in effect, secondary. The first test of a budget-based institution and the first requirement for its survival is to obtain the budget. And the budget is not, by definition, related to contribution but to good intentions.[7]



Because of their dependence on budgets, service organizations differ from production organizations in several other ways. Service organizations try to avoid controversy in order to protect their budgets. The "young Turks" of the library profession, who want to make libraries into more socially active institutions, fail to recognize that they are fighting this natural tendency of service organizations to protect the source of their existence, their budget.

Production organizations select a certain segment of the market and ignore the rest. For example, a manufacturer of children's clothes needs only to attract buyers from the child-producing segment of the population and ignores those not in this category. Libraries must satisfy everyone, even the nonpatron. How often have irate demands to remove books come not from the youth, the user, but from the mother, the nonuser, who discovers the child reading the book?

These major differences lead one to conclude that in selecting business procedures librarians may have selected the wrong model. At the very least the profession should use care in applying business principles to libraries.

There is one problem common to both types of institutions: What does the organization buy with the wage it pays? Most administrators seem to believe the salaries they pay buy: 1) eternal gratitude, 2) undivided loyalty, 3) perpetual silence, 4) long suffering, and 5) respect and adulation from their employees.

This is a real bargain if they can get it! However, the wages should be buying: 1) creativity, 2) initiative, 3) advice and help, 4) cooperation, and 5) goodwill. These cannot be bought with money alone! In addition to wages the administrator owes employees 1) concern and interest in them; 2) training and advancement, even if some of the better employees go to other organizations; 3) responsible positions which build self-esteem; 4) participation in problem-solving that calls upon the employees' knowledge, experience, and creativity; and 5) treatment as an equal, as a human being.

Still the boss is getting a bargain! Administering the library becomes a much easier job. Too often administrators ask what the employee can do for the organization in return for a salary. Few ask what the organization should do for the individual employee.

Although this problem applies to both types, service organizations must exert more effort to solve it. Their effectiveness depends upon satisfied, dedicated employees. Dsgruntled behavior on the part of service organization personnel angers patrons and causes bad public relations, which, in turn, threatens the budget. Citizens in these times will no longer tolerate mistreatment by governmental service organizations.

Administrative expediency

The most insidious, but most prevalent, reason given for bad administration is "administrative expediency"—the numerous acts of administrators to make their working lives easier and to avoid controversy or conflict. Here the administrator puts personal working comfort over the welfare of his employees and the objectives of the library.

Service organizations avoid controversy by nature, but when an administrator applies this policy to his employees he neglects his duty. To attempt to pacify a board of trustees, faculty committee, principal, or superior at the expense of employees is to commit the greatest of administrative mistakes. Often bosses go through motions of making salary increases and promotional recommendations, but surrender at the first sign of resistance. This lack of protection and support for staff on the part of administrators can cause employees to form unions.

Administrative expediency not only emerges in the role of the boss as mediator between the staff and the governing authority, it also plays a prominent role—possibly a dominant role—in his direct relations with the staff. All too often the administrator seems to assume a simple, one-to-one relation with each of his staff members, as if the organization consisted of a series of single personal interactions. In truth, the group as a whole forms an interrelation which the administrator must recognize. Administrative lack of recognition of this group interaction is what I call the "third party beneficiary" problem.

If one individual does not do his job, the average administrator sees the problem as one of a simple, direct interaction between boss and offender. Only the deficient employee is considered, and the other employees who must do the incompleted work are neglected. This latter group comprises a number of "third party beneficiaries," and they have an important interest in what is done in this difficult situation. When the administrator fails to act, as so often happens, the other members of the organization are, in effect, punished. But the manager's job is made easier by assuming this one-to-one relationship. It simplifies the task and helps avoid the larger responsibility to the group.

Administrators often promote on the basis of how well they get along with an individual, not on the basis of skill, intelligence, experience, talent, and performance. They promote the "yes men." But, as the Richard Nixon experience clearly shows, these may be the very persons the manager should not promote. The head librarian needs people who disagree and will say so. Disagreement discloses mistakes, creates new ideas, clears away obsolete procedures, and ultimately creates consensus, not compliance. It should be sought out and encouraged. There is no deadlier blow to morale, initiative, creativity, cooperation, and communication than promotion by convenience or for personal preference.

The administrator is able to promote on the basis of personal relationships because of a failure to establish a personnel policy which includes career ladders. Thus ability and good work are penalized. (In one of the seminars in management I conduct, one participant remarked, "Doing a good job is the best way to insure you'll be doing the same thing next year!") In essence, the administrator reverses B. F. Skinner's rules for conditioning: the administrator punishes the person doing a good job and rewards someone else for reasons other than their performance.

The "kick him upstairs" promotion to remove a person from responsibility is another example of administrative expediency. This solves the administrator's immediate problem but creates long-run morale problems, sets unworthy precedents, and is dishonest to the other staff members. It is dishonest to other institutions which eventually hire the individual because they believe the promotion had substance.

Favoritism, which manifests itself in a multitude of ways, must be counted on as an administrative expediency. The administrator promotes, protects, and confides in a favorite individual, without taking this individual's merits into consideration and, again, other staff members suffer.

But even when the administrator is not rewarding favorites, administrative expediency is still allowed to cheat the deserving employee out of earned recompense. Equal raises are often granted to all employees to avoid the wrath of a jealous employee. Applying a formula across the board is so much easier than having to make the hard decisions required to reward merit. Too often the expedient boss calls this "equity!"

Administration by crisis

Crisis or "surprise" administration is caused by omission, not commission. No administrator deliberately manufactures crises or springs surprises on the staff. Most deplore surprises as much as the staff. Crises seem to be natural events the administrator is helpless to prevent.

The number of crises and surprises faced by an institution still depends upon the administrator. Many head librarians turn the most insignificant events into crises. I knew one librarian who dropped everything, and demanded that his staff do likewise, for even a routine request from a faculty member. The crisis ended only when the staff satisfied that faculty member.

What events will most administrators turn into crises? Almost all will react to real or apparent challenges to authority as if they were crises. Let an employee question the boss's actions, and the boss marshalls all defenses, thus precipitating a crisis. Let an employee mention unions or advisory committees, and the administrator mans the parapets.

Staff conflicts affect the boss almost as dramatically as challenges to authority. The average employed American confronts the boss seldom, but violently. Americans seem to lack the ability to disagree politely and often. Every conflict grows abrasive, as if the contestants' personal pride were involved. Every question becomes a challenge to be met with all one's resources. Every suggestion indicts the honesty or ability of the person to whom it was addressed. Every communication hides within it a threat. Of course, all Americans are not paranoid, but we've all encountered such incidents—and just one is too many!

Every demand or request from superiors can precipitate a crisis. In some cases the request brings a sense of anxiety bordering on crisis. The president of the university or the mayor of the city need only telephone the library to set in motion a host of activities to impress or flatter the dignitary with "instant" response.

These and many other events provoke crises. What does one do to prevent a crisis situation? Plan!

Administration by crisis and surprise indicates a lack of planning. Plans can probably prevent crisis. Just as all public buildings must have plans in case of fire, plans which may prevent disaster, all administrators must have plans to handle as many situations as they can foresee. The fact that one cannot predict all events is no excuse for not trying to predict some. The administrator may develop personnel policy and procedure manuals which provide routines for many potential crises. (This would also prevent ad hoc personnel decisions.) The boss can provide job descriptions and training which guide the employee, prevent confusion and jurisdictional disputes, and squelch many unnecessary conflicts and crises. The person in charge can communicate more fully to the staff to prevent the unpleasant surprises which come when an employee is not told in advance. It helps to encourage horizontal coordination and cooperation and not demand that all decisions go through the chief's office. Consequently, one department or division knows what another is doing and is saved from the surprise that often comes upon learning that another department has initiated plans or actions which will affect it. Planning, job descriptions, personnel manuals, communication, and cooperation are usually lacking in organizations continually afflicted by crisis and surprise.

Excessive hierarchy and bureaucracy

Librarians complain vehemently that they are not permitted to make decisions. They often state that they must take a decision through three or more levels before they reach the person who ultimately decides. Nothing angers me more than to ask a librarian a routine question and get the response that the question must be referred to the head librarian. My anger quickly turns to embarrassment for the library profession and pity for the librarian treated as a child.

A profession has been defined as a group of individuals which has a theoretical body of knowledge, a period of formal training, a code of conduct, and members who receive fees and not salaries. One must add independence of judgment! Without the responsibility for independence of judgment an individual is not a professional. This is exactly what is missing in so many library jobs.

In addition to robbing the individual of his self-esteem, excessive hierarchy stifles professional initiative and destroys professional pride. It restricts the professional librarian to the routine, to functions already prescribed by the boss's decisions. This insures an inflexibility which only a boss's direct decision can alter. One might ask why an administrator would tolerate such a system, much less promote it. Would not his job be easier if he were not forced to be a perpetual decision-maker? The only plausible reason for this is the head librarian's haunting fear of losing control!

Japanese managers, according to the Johnson-Ouchi article referred to above, rarely draw organization charts, but if they do the manager "invariably makes them read horizontally, like a flow chart."[8] Regardless of what the original designer of the organization chart intended, tradition has turned the hierarchical chart into a map of authority, describing areas of superiority and subordination. One can detect immediately where one stands in the organizational pecking order, and this knowledge can subtract from personal worth and dignity. An orbital organization chart modifies the superior-subordinate relationship so glaringly obvious on the hierarchical chart.

In cases of excessive bureaucracy, most problems travel from where they originate and where the working librarian knows the most about them to the isolation of managerial offices and the clique of trusted favorites. This would not be too bad if that working librarian went along with the problem, gave advice, and had the boss's confidence. But too often the head librarian rationalizes and states that only he or she "sees the big picture" and knows what's best for the organization as a whole. Often, unhappily, the chief is more out of touch not only with the staff employees but also the patrons.

Administration by platitude

The "open door policy" is the oldest and most enduring of the platitudes. When the boss says, "My door is always open" and welcomes any employee who has a problem, the implication is that he or she will listen and consider every problem seriously. Rarely does the administrator wonder why so few ever take advantage of the offer.

My opinion of the "open door policy" has changed only slightly since I wrote to the editor of the University of Illinois Library Staff Bulletin in June 1969. That letter is reproduced, in part, below:

> In the last issue of the Bulletin you reported that the Library has an "open door policy" to communicate grievances from bottom to top. I was rather surprised at this for the "open door policy" has been discredited by most writers on personnel administration. Essentially such a policy is supposed to fit into the larger context of intra-organizational communications, and as a communicative device it is a failure. . . .
> Now, does the "open door policy" contribute to communication? The answer appears to be "no." In fact, it probably raises more questions than it answers. Here are a few examples, while at the same time pointing out its failures.
>
> In the first place, to whom does an employee go with a complaint? If a fellow employee is the problem he can go to his supervisor. But what if his supervisor is part of the problem and not part of the solution? (In this case an employee will usually prefer to leave rather than risk a squabble. Without some formal means of communication the organization loses an employee.) Does the employee go to the next higher supervisor—"over the boss's head," a practice condemned in our society almost as drastically as "squealing on a friend?" What if he sees his supervisor and his superior often talking together, going to coffee together, going to lunch together, and exchanging social visits? Wouldn't he be dissuaded from approaching a friend of his supervisor with a complaint against his supervisor? What then? Does he go to the head man himself?
>
> This introduces the next major set of questions. Is the social distance between the director of an organization, or his immediate assistants, and the employee too great to permit free and open interchange and discussion of an employee's complaint? Odds are the employee would be too uncomfortable to express himself fully and accurately. Even assuming complete candor is possible, is the executive thereby obliged to conduct a complete and thorough investigation of the complaint? Anything short of that makes the "open door policy" more promise than substance. But obviously neither condition can be met. Even if the employee spoke freely and frankly to the director, today's busy executives could not afford the time to conduct a proper investigation without slighting their primary duties.
> . . . Can the overall supervisor overrule the first-level supervisor without dire consequences? If he does, the supervisor loses face and, under the circumstances, may decide to leave. If the director takes the employee's side against the supervisor, the employee may have won the battle but who would be rash enough to suggest he has won the war? Human nature dictates that the supervisor will resent the victory and will make all future decisions detrimental to the victorious employee. This creates a vicious circle of complaint—overruling—revenge—complaint, ad infinitum.

I contend that no modern organization can tolerate the lack of direction and the disruption resulting from an "open door policy." First, the employee must know to whom to take a complaint, however trivial. Secondly, the organization suffers when its directors, disregarding established lines of authority and every office in the organization, continually investigate disputes, and overrule intermediate supervisors. The "open door policy" may be a great egalitarian gesture—a must for any liberal thinking man—but in practice it is little more than that—a gesture.

What an organization needs is a formally elected group to represent the employee in a grievance proceeding. All employees need to realize that the group is available for this purpose. Such an approach formalizes conflict, brings it out in the open, and makes its solution a matter of fact and not a personal matter. Further, all must realize that a grievance is not a violation of social etiquette but a form of communication—a signal to let the supervisors know something is wrong. The supervisor should not take the complaint as a personal affront or to solve a pressing problem. Actually, the supervisor needs the communication more than the employee for with the employee only a personal inconvenience is involved while with the supervisor the welfare of the organization is at stake. . . .

Another oft-repeated platitude, closely related to the open door policy, is the boss's assertion that employees are encouraged to speak out and the boss will listen. A critic of American administration is now circulating a list of "administrative definitions" which offers true meanings for administrative jargon. He translates "Give me the benefit of your thinking" to mean "We'll listen to what you have to say as long as it doesn't interfere with what we have already decided to do." Few practices could affect morale more adversely than a false promise to listen. I know of one college administrator who appoints ad hoc committees on numerous problems, only to ignore their recommendations. Members of organizations soon learn that such committees are a formality to give the appearance of member participation, but they won't be fooled a second time! In the meantime, they suffer in silence—but plot revenge.

According to Kathleen Stebbins, "Listening is the most neglected skill of communication"—one might change "communication" to read "administration"—and supervisors should spend 45 percent of their communication time listening.[9]

The "open door policy" and other promises to listen are only two of a vast number of platitudes used by administrators. Others are: praise meant to placate but which contains no substance; solicitations of one's health, family, etc. done spasmodically and superficially; the annual Christmas party or gifts; the I'm-a-jolly-good-guy pat on the back; the you've-done-a-good-job plaque or letter; dean's or librarian's award; news releases; the annual you-ve'never-had-it-so-good message; and light-hearted, jovial encounters at parties and receptions.

"Maturity lessons"—if there were such things—would provide the answer to most of the problems listed above. Unfortunately, no educational institutions have seen fit to establish courses in maturity—Maturity 101! Yet fear, legalism, blaming, yielding to expediency, a patronizing attitude, and inflexibility are all signs of immature behavior.

To begin with, the course would start off negatively. When one finds oneself in a remedial situation, one often must resort to the negative or destructive—clear the landscape before building. Few will argue that our cultural landscape is not strewn with psychological debris which has to be removed before psychological building can take place.

For a text for the negative side of "Maturity 101" one could not do better than Albert Ellis and Robert Harper's A Guide to Rational Living. The authors devote Chapters 10 through 19 to irrational ideas or beliefs which stand in the way of individual achievement and happiness and which must be cleared before one can start the positive segment of the course in maturity. According to Ellis and Harper these irrational ideas are:

Irrational Idea No. 1: "The idea that it is a dire necessity for an adult to be loved or approved by almost everyone for virtually everything he does."

Irrational Idea No. 2: "The idea that one should be thoroughly competent, adequate, and achieving, in all possible respects."

Irrational Idea No. 3: "The idea that certain people are bad, wicked, or villainous and that they should be severely blamed and punished for their sins."

Irrational Idea No. 4: "The idea that it is terrible, horrible, and catastrophic when things are not going the way one would like them to go."

Irrational Idea No. 5: "The idea that human unhappiness is externally caused and that people have little or no ability to control their sorrows or rid themselves of their negative feelings."

Irrational Idea No. 6: "The idea that if something is or may be dangerous or fearsome, one should be terribly occupied with and upset about it."

Irrational Idea No. 7: "The idea that it is easier to avoid facing many life difficulties and self-responsibilities than to undertake more rewarding forms of self-discipline."

Irrational Idea No. 8: "The idea that the past is all-important and that because something once strongly affected one's life, it should indefinitely do so."

Irrational Idea No. 9: "The idea that people and things should be different from the way they are and that it is catastrophic if perfect solutions to the grim realities of life are not immediately found."

Irrational Idea No. 10: "The idea that maximum human happiness can be achieved by inertia and inaction or by passively and uncommittedly 'enjoying oneself'."

To these, and still on the negative side, I would add eight administrative "don'ts."

1) Don't use the organization for personal reasons or benefit. Don't use the organization to reward friends or punish enemies.

2) Don't be afraid of superiors. Eleanor Roosevelt once said: "No one can insult you without your permission," implying that it is not what someone says that hurts, but the way you interpret the remark. Equally so: No one can make you afraid, or intimidate you, without your permission.

3) Don't instill fear in subordinates. Don't stifle their creativity and initiative by causing them to place your reaction above their ability to express themselves.

4) Don't judge and, consequently, there will be no need or impulse to blame. Solve problems, but don't burden an employee with guilt—to do so is never productive. (See Charles Gragg's fine article "Whose Fault Was It?" in the January-February, 1964 Harvard Business Review, p. 107-10.)

5) Don't always take the easy course. You may solve the immediate problem, and suffer a little, but in the long run you generate many problems, and suffer a lot. In other words, turn a difficult decision into an easy one at your own peril and expect to pay the high exchange rate which must eventually follow.

6) Don't play favorites. Don't let your likes or dislikes dictate a decision. You will end up with all "yes men."

7) Don't be afraid to reward merit. Don't deny a deserving employee an award because someone else will become jealous and demand equal recognition.

8) Don't be secretive or devious. Most of us work in public organizations and are subject to some type of "freedom of information" law. Such laws preclude secrecy, but they should also guarantee the employee's right to know what goes on in his own organization. Secrets, more often than not, breed gossip and rumors.

Maturity 101 would have its positive segment. Basically the course would follow the teachings of the humanitarian psychologists William James, A. H. Maslow, Frederic Perls, and Carl Rogers. Human dignity, self-esteem, and sensitivity to others would form the trinity with which the students would attempt to commune.

Americans are raised with efficiency and productivity preached to them daily. This may be gospel in production organizations—it is a doubtful gospel in service organizations. We emphasize the satisfied customer in both production and service organizations. Should we not back up and bestow some of our concern upon the employees who produce the product or the service? Quality products and excellent service would result if the individuals who provide them are satisfied workers.

Service organizations must stress effectiveness, but effectiveness won't come from an unhappy employee. Dissatisfied librarians produce dissatisfied patrons.

Total emphasis on production or the satisfied patron does real damage to the employee's self-esteem. He soon learns that the manager considers him merely a tool or instrument to be used in accomplishing what the manager considers more important: a product or a satisfied patron. The librarian should receive satisfaction and self-esteem from the work he does. Most people spend half their awakening day, five days a week, on the job. They must not always take second place to the buyer or the patron.

Humanitarian administration would provide the basic theme for Maturity 101, and the employee, not production or service, would take center stage. James, Maslow, Perls, and Rogers would orchestrate the final production.

After shifting the emphasis from production to people, Maturity 101 would turn to ways of building self-esteem. Maslow's hierarchy of needs would provide the model, but instead of stopping when social needs are fulfilled, as occurs in most organizations, the student would explore ways to help the employee develop self-esteem. Among the ways of doing this the student might consider giving the employee more independence of judgment, giving him more problem-solving authority, giving him the right to initiate programs. Then ultimately the student would approach the difficult problem of promoting self-actualization.

The next segment of the course would attempt to correct what Johnson-Ouchi claim is a lack of human relations skills; lack of communication skills; and lack of coordination skills on the part of American administrators.[11] With the American society's emphasis on "individualism" this would be difficult, if not impossible. American organizations have conducted sensitivity training sessions, but so far these sessions have been superficial and emphasized one's effect upon others, and how to disclose one's inner feelings through slogans such as the obscene cliché, "Let it all hang out". They have ignored training in how to be sensitive to the needs and feelings of others. Ideally one would want to develop the human relations skills described by Robert Lifton.

> Chinese culture has—possibly at the expense of technological advance—always emphasized the human aspects of life, and particularly the nuances of personal relationships. Children are taught to be sensitive to psychological currents about them, in order to learn how to behave appropriately toward others. In the educated adult, this sensitivity is expected and required. Most Chinese intellectuals whom I knew, as subjects or as friends, impressed me with their consistent skill in perceiving the emotion at play between one person and another, as well as their tendency to make use of this understanding in seeking their life objectives. They conducted human relationships as one practices a highly refined art.[12]

No society can accomplish this overnight, or even in decades, but that doesn't detract from the desirability to move in that direction.

Communications skills would undoubtedly improve with human relations skills, but for added assurance Maturity 101 would emphasize listening skills. Prospective administrators would learn to listen, really listen, instead of the typical exchange where one party is composing his or her thoughts and preparing what to say next while the others are talking to him or her. Carl Rogers, in his book On Becoming a Person, provides a perfect formula upon which to build this segment of the course: "Each person can speak up for himself only after (emphasis his) he has first restated the ideas and feelings of the previous speaker accurately, and to the speaker's satisfaction."[13]

Maturity 101 would then turn to coordination skills. Again the course would have to start with the remedial task of teaching potential American library administrators that every criticism is not necessarily a blot on their personal honor. They would learn that every suggestion does not reflect upon their ability or lack of it; that every complaint is not a sign of disloyalty; that every disagreement is not the first sign of a battle to the death; that every discussion does not have to be considered conflict. They would learn that conflict itself is not necessarily bad. The course would teach that a manager learns from criticism, suggestions, complaints, disagreement, discussion, and conflict. Nothing is learned from silence.

The positive side of teaching coordination skills would involve developing better techniques for conducting group discussions and committee meetings, for soliciting attitudes, for developing surveys and polls, and for conducting interpersonal relations. (One personnel officer of a large public library told my class if she could add one item to an administration course in graduate schools of library science, she would add material on how to lead group discussions and she would recommend Harold Zelko's book, Successful Conference and Discussion Techniques, for the text.[14]) Here the student would try to develop poise, impartiality, tact, understanding, and empathy as well as leadership skills in conducting discussion groups. The student would learn to strive for consensus, not a majority; an interchange of ideas, not an adversary relationship; a problem-solving approach, not domination; a friendly conflict, not control by intimidation. The potential administrator would establish an atmosphere conducive to free expression of opinion and encourage the more reticent to speak out. All individuals in the organization would be persuaded that they not only have a right, but a duty, to speak out—a duty to themselves, to the organization, and to the manager!

We speak of administrative theories as if they could cure all organization ills, but the disease reaches much deeper into individual personalities and personality traits encouraged by our society. Therefore, one must consider more than just organizational structure and procedures. To administer successfully one must start at the beginning and consider actual events in the organization, events not dictated by administrative behavior but by individual behavior. Look not to the stars but into ourselves.

information & referral service: an LJ series, number 2

by Carolyn Luck and Robert Croneberger, Jr.

IN THE FIRST ARTICLE in this series, we discussed what information and referral is and is not, the distinguishing factors between information and referral and social work, the concept of advocacy as it relates to information and referral, and the importance of recognizing that information and referral is library work and not some "special service" attached to an existing institution. This article will deal with the reasons why so many "services to the disadvantaged" and other innovative projects end up being disadvantaged services. The public is the obvious and most important loser when this happens, but the public library loses a part of its future as a service institution each time it fails in another effort to serve the unserved. We think the major factor in the creation of disadvantaged services (to the "disadvantaged") is the "special service" status which isolates them from the library system, denying them support, authority, resources beyond special funding, and prevents them from providing first-rate library service. This is the same factor which too often allows the "regular" library to abdicate its responsibilities to the disadvantaged.

The introduction of information and referral service into a public library system is a change in that system. In order to manage change and not be victimized by it, it is necessary to view the system as a whole and analyze how this new component moves the system toward the achievement of its goal and objectives. How can it fit in and work as an effective part of the system? If the new component is in conflict with the goals and objectives or (as is much more likely) the goals and objectives have not been formulated clearly enough for judgment of conflict or compatibility, the goals and objectives must be changed (or articulated and examined) or a rational decision must be made against introducing a change which will be counterproductive. If, for example, a library is defined through its goals and objectives as a place where books are kept and no decision is made to change its conscious role, the introduction of information and referral is clearly counterproductive. Efforts to do information and referral, or any other service which is antithetical to the stated or implicit goals, is likely to create internal disaster through staff conflict or end quietly in frustration and disappointment for the proponents of the change.

Change without conflict

The issue is really a choice of strategies for change. Obviously, it is possible and sometimes useful to make a deliberate choice to go against what is traditional in order to create change through conflict. In extreme cases (of organizational paralysis), this may be the best choice available. However, this strategy has a high mortality rate both in terms of the projects which are its vehicles and the people who take the personal and professional risks. A more subtle consequence of this strategy is the gradual institutionalization of resident troublemakers and in-house adversaries which has taken place in a number of library systems since the sixties, and by which people interested in change have created their own tokenism. If an in-house adversary is tireless, self-sacrificing, extremely dedicated to serving people through libraries, and extremely knowledgeable in dealing with conflict for positive gains, he may have impact on the system which will result in more effective services. If he is lacking in any of the above attributes (which means if he is human), that impact will be diminished. If, however, the person who adopts a conflict strategy is someone who thinks librarians are no good and libraries have nothing good to offer (except his new service, if they would only let him do it), he should not be in a library system. His destructive contributions will far outweigh any positive benefits as his long-range strategy is probably to wipe out libraries for the good of society.

I & R equals reference

We think that a cooperative approach which recognizes the strengths and weaknesses of a system and aims at improving that system in terms of the services it provides by making the whole library accountable for serving its publics is more likely to be more effective than a conflict strategy launched by a "special" department, project, staff, or individual. We believe that the major goal of public libraries should be to provide useful and needed information to the citizens who support it, and we have found compatible goals and objectives here at the Memphis and Shelby County Public Library and Information Center. Information and referral is one type of service which can meet that major goal if coordinated with other library services (traditional and innovative).

The need for coordination of information and referral services and reference services is clear when the nature of "I & R" questions is examined. A high proportion of the requests received by most nonlibrary information and referral centers are information requests, for example: "What is the telephone number of 'X' agency?" Is there a local chapter of 'X' organization?" "How can I get in touch with them?" Many of these questions are regularly answered through the reference services of libraries not actively involved in anything called information and referral. There is a fuzzy line between "I & R" questions and reference questions, and only the most arbitrary distinctions could separate the "Information" in information and referral from reference. In other words, the content or source should not be the criteria for classifying an "I & R" question. The outcome is the operative distinction: information-giving, or referral to an agency for service. The first category cannot be clearly distinguished from reference questions, at least not by content. A question on venereal disease might be related to finding out where to get tested or treated, but it might also be an inquiry to the medical or social issues of VD which would be handled through reference tools other than the information and referral file or directory. They cannot be distinguished by source. The appropriate referral may be found through use of any number of reference tools including those in subject departments and the telephone. They cannot be distinguished by patron. It is absurd to classify reference questions asked by "the disadvantaged" as "I & R" questions. The only clear distinction is between reference and referral, and that distinction can only be made by the outcome—by the service rendered, whether it is the giving of information only or referral to an agency for service. Obviously, referral services cannot be offered separately from information services because frequently the combination of both is required.

Carolyn Luck is Head of Information and Referral Service at the Memphis and Shelby County Public Library and Information Center, Tennessee and Robert Croneberger, Jr. is the Assistant Director for Public Services

The "funny files"

Given that many "I & R" questions turn out to be reference questions (or reference and referral) the effective use of the entire information system which is the public library is essential to good information and referral service. For example, at Memphis and Shelby County Public Library and Information Center, the Literature Department maintains a file of translators and also an interdenominational file of local ministers (since the department includes religion). These are valuable reference tools in the provision of information and referral services but should not be taken over by some special information and referral staff or incorporated into an information and referral file. The practical impossibility of creating an all-inclusive file is easily seen by taking an inventory of the "funny files" which exist in subject departments. Criteria for inclusion, consistency of format, the need for highly specialized information in a file designed to serve the general public, and the physical problems of reproducing and housing a large file in all branches would be some of the problems created. However, the mere fact that specialized files of important information exist in reference departments does not make them accessible.

There are four factors which make such files accessible and thereby part of the information system: 1) Cooperation among departments and branches to serve the public is essential. A patron is a patron and information is information. No service system can operate well on the assumption that "my patron is more important than your patron" or that "my information is mine." 2) There must be sufficient access by telephone within the library system. It is farcical to masquerade as an information system if you have too few telephone lines for efficient internal communication, not to mention lines to provide adequate public access. 3) There must be knowledge throughout the system of where to check for various types of information. In developing the subject index to the information and referral file at the Memphis and Shelby County Public Library and Information Center, we are listing main library reference departments when appropriate as one means of letting branch library people know where to look. 4) Such files and current information in subject areas must be viewed as important enough to be kept up-to-date and in sufficient depth. A decision to leave subject files intact and make use of them as part of a total information system is a decision to enhance subject specialties as something beneficial to that system, enabling the system to provide more benefits to the public. It is a decision against taking information away from the specialists, who have the readiest opportunities to gather it and who can probably make the best use of it, because it may be in a different format, be current, or come from people rather than from print. This is not unlike a decision made recently in this library to transfer spoken-word recordings from the Music Department to appropriate subject departments or a decision to intershelve cassette tapes with books.

The other major reason for building information and referral services into the total library system is to maximize the benefits of decentralization. The decentralized branch-main library structure of urban public libraries facilitates both the collection and dissemination of community information. It is the only existing structure which holds the potential of creating neighborhood information centers. Doing information and referral systemwide and making it regular library work can multiply the support and resources applied to its success.

It should be clear from what we have said about building information and referral services into the system and doing the service systemwide that we do not see information and referral as a service to the "disadvantaged." Rather we see it as a service to the citizens of the city and/or county which supports the library. All citizens have needs for information which are currently not being met by existing sources. Because funding and community interests are frequently tied to the idea of service to the disadvantaged, it is not a term or a concept which libraries can get rid of entirely. More importantly, because of the unmet needs of segments of the population, it is important to develop ways to serve them and ways to evaluate the services provided. However, we think it makes more sense to make every service outlet in the system responsible for meeting the needs of its community in the most appropriate and effective ways. Some people react to the idea of integrating services to the disadvantaged into the regular library with suspicion that it may be a sinister cop-out or subtly disguised racism. Our view is the reverse: that the creation of disadvantaged services for people who need first-rate services allows library systems to cop-out on their responsibilities, in effect discriminating in the provision of public services.

A systems approach to establishing information and referral services has far-reaching effects on the library. Priorities need to be clearly defined, and budget allocations must be aligned accordingly. It is useless to say, "information and referral is top priority," unless the necessary changes are made to translate that statement into workable reality. If more staff is needed, if clerical procedures need to be reviewed and streamlined in order to make staff time available for information and referral, if more telephones, extended hours, publicity, etc. are needed, hard decisions must be made and clearly communicated in order to make the updated priorities real. Crisis management (reacting to whatever happens in the way that seems best at the moment) will not work. Planned organizational change is the rational alternative, although it is by no means mistake-proof or problem-free.

Authority

Hiring an "outreach librarian" (who is usually young, enthusiastic and fresh out of library school) to be in charge of a new, priority service with no clear authority to do so is a contradiction. It will most likely lead to staff resistance to that new "radical" and to frustration of the isolated project librarian who is unable to do his job because of lack of guidelines, authority, and expertise. An expert in information and referral or an enthusiastic idealist committed to change cannot fairly be expected to be an expert at planning, organizational change, or staff relations.

There are some very practical administrative problems involved in setting up information and referral services which can only be dealt with by proper systemwide authority. For example, the telephone changes we have referred to (additional lines, instruments, three-way devices) are important and must be planned for. These seemingly small changes involve allocation of funds, assessment of needs (which can only be done by visits to branches and consultations with the branch librarians), and working with the telephone company to be sure that they do what you want (do they have to dig trenches in cement floors in order to install required equipment?). Perhaps you discover a branch which doesn't have an information desk. Perhaps the branches in the low-income areas of the city or county are only open part-time and are staffed by one or two people. Perhaps there is another innovative service going on in the library (i.e., Adult Basic Education or Cable TV) which should be coordinated in some ways with information and referral. None of these practical problems can be handled effectively without proper authority. They are all important to the provision of information and referral services.

Full service to all

In summary, it is essential that we not create isolated and poorly administered "disadvantaged services" which are disguised as service to the disadvantaged. It is equally essential not to isolate information and referral services either in terms of the back-up resources of the library system or by limiting public access to them. We end up ripping off the "disadvantaged," and the dedicated, enthusiastic staff who expect to accomplish so much. Without a coordinated systemwide service directed toward all citizens, we are turning our backs on the very people we claim we wish to reach. Full service to all citizens must be the goal.

Our next article will deal with outreach methods aimed at achieving this goal, and how "outreach" service has been misplaced in public library service.

The media maze

ASHEIM, Lester & Sara. I. Fenwick, eds. Differentiating the Media. Proceedings of the Thirty-seventh Annual Conference of the Graduate Library School, August 5-6, 1974.

Univ. of Chicago Pr. (Univ. of Chicago Studies in Library Science). 1975. 74p. ISBN 0-226-02964-6. LC 74-28809. $5.95.

Taking it for granted that libraries "will be multi-media agencies in this indisputably multi-media age," this conference aimed at nothing less than "identifying those characteristics—technical, aesthetic, social and psychological—that determine the effectiveness of each medium." A "useful first step," Asheim modestly asserts. A first step? Nonsense. Once again, librarians are discovered congratulating themselves for finally addressing problems which have received the extensive research energies of communications specialists for decades. Shall we charitably attribute this belatedness to "culture lag"? Shall we uncharitably attribute this to the steadfast refusal of the profession to hearken to anyone but other librarians? Let us be charitable. Surely, the conference was expected to enlighten the uninitiated; but despite the individual excellences of the contributions, it is a mixed bag, not quite on the mark of its announced goals.

Three nonlibrarians are called upon to explore the specifics of media: Ron Powers on television, Donald R. Gordon on print, and Virginia Wexman, whose "The Maltese Falcon from Fiction to Film," while scholarly and well-intentioned, seemed too specific for beginners to assimilate. However much they need to acquire film vocabulary, librarians need to abandon this sort of "but is it like the book" discussion. The inevitable paper on "Administrative Problems"—this one by Wesley Doak—has a sensible unified media approach, but serves to underscore the conference managers' fears that, to the majority of its audience, "this concentration of program time on the characteristics that determine the effectiveness of a few of the media would seem impractical and irrelevant." A sad comment, indicating how far the profession needs to come away from what Frances Henne rightly calls "the container orientation." Future conferences will, perhaps, have the courage of their convictions, and be unafraid to concentrate exclusively on media characteristics.

A last note: can we all please stop calling mineral specimens or toys, or rabbits—"media"? Asheim makes the same plea in his introduction. Obviously, a "mineral specimen" is a real object, not a mediated experience on film or paper. This confusion of "media" with "realia" has helped to give media a bad name. The essays, which previously appeared in Library Quarterly for January 1975, all deserve to be read.—ESTELLE JUSSIM, SCHOOL OF LIBRARY SCIENCE, SIMMONS COLLEGE, BOSTON

Clive Bingley & Linnet. 1975. 124p. index. ISBN (Bingley) 0-85157-192-1; (Linnet) 0-208-01367-9. LC 72-2353. $8.

A broad introduction to those basic English language forms of publication usually included in the beginning library school course covering trade and national bibliography. Davinson, head of the Department of Librarianship at Leeds Polytechnic, writes from a British viewpoint, but tries to bring into view American titles where these parallel the British. There are a number of curious omissions, nevertheless. One example is Chapter 3, National Bibliographies of Books, which is restricted entirely to British titles. Chapter 13, Bibliographic Compilation and Bibliographic Citation, is rather superficial and will not be of much help to students. Davinson does, however, cite other sources in this and other chapters which are helpful.

The book contains a number of typographic errors; there is inconsistency in citation of listed titles; there are some factual errors. All these may be typing errors, but could have been prevented by careful proofreading.

The index calls for special attention. A random check indicates that many titles cited in the text are missing in the index. There are also errors of citation and in page references.

American library school students would still profit from this book. Its breadth of coverage, especially of newer media, and its inclusion of titles of many articles and books about bibliography make it of particular value.—JOHN E. KEPHART, SCHOOL OF LIBRARY & INFORMATION SCIENCE, STATE UNIVERSITY OF NEW YORK COLLEGE AT GENESEO

Collective bargaining

Labour Relations and the Librarian. Proceedings of a seminar sponsored by the Institute of Professional Librarians of Ontario, May 12-15, 1974.

The Institute. 1974. 90p. appendixes, pap. $6, plus 50¢ mailing.

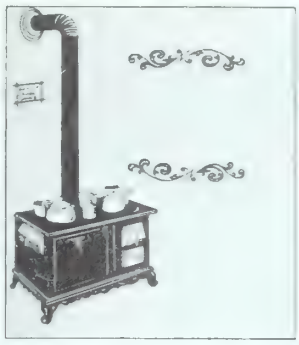
This seminar gathered the views of three labor relations officers, three attorneys, two union executives, and a sociologist. Although the emphasis is on Canada and public libraries, any librarian with a concern for collective bargaining could benefit from reading it. At least three of the talks are of quite general interest. Law professor Earl Palmer's "The Nature of the Collective Agreement" is nearly as useful to Americans as to Canadians. John Parker, manager of labor relations for the University of Toronto, concisely addresses an issue vital to the professional identity of all sorts of librarians in his "Defining a Bargaining Unit." Sociologist Ernie Lucy's "Union and Management Posture" is so general that he could deliver the same address by substituting "chemist," "engineer," etc. wherever he has said "librarian." Just the same, we should listen carefully to his tentative opinion that a bureaucracy has to be working well before employee participation can replace it.

The only American—and only librarian—Margaret Sellers, describes "The Detroit Experience." Her job includes preparing management clauses for bargaining, and administering the agreements with unions. Her account of how backward her employers had been and how nice the union had been in allowing them to become reasonable suggests that unions may have fewer problems than they dream.

Most of the speakers represent, or sympathize with, the union side of the table. This imbalance is understandable in view of the union's greater numbers, availability, volubility, and proselytizing zeal. Happily, the variety and integrity of this seminar remains intact. All too easily such conferences become gatherings where people of similar views engage in mutual perturbation.

Even though only one of the speakers was a librarian, the Proceedings are highly relevant to us. That, too, should tell us what to expect in the arena that we have entered.—JOHN WEATHERFORD, CENTRAL MICHIGAN UNIVERSITY LIBRARY, MOUNT PLEASANT

LJ CHECKLIST



Recipes of '96

The Stewart Public Library, originally The Grinnell (Iowa) Free Library, has reprinted a cook book that was published and sold for the benefit of the library in 1896, when it consisted of reading rooms located above stores and businesses. "Over Five Hundred Tested and Tried and Specially Selected Recipes" were contributed by the "Best Cooks among the Ladies of Grinnell." Recipes, most of which are cavalier about exact measures, include foam omelet, huckleberry breakfast cake, and apple pan dowdy. Directions for making beauty aids are given, and a short treatise on eggs recommends them for everything from soothing a burn to sealing and stamping letters. A list of materials available at the 1896 library is appended. The sections of the 120-page booklet are interspersed with advertisements from local merchants of the period. The Free Library Cook Book costs $2 from Mrs. Virginia S. Cameron, Librarian, Stewart Library, Grinnell, Ia.

Energy manual

Valuable tips for conserving energy have been compiled by some extraordinarily frugal Downeasters in The Energy Miser's Manual. The booklet, which has a preface by Senator Edmund Muskie, tackles reducing the car's appetite, beating spiraling household costs, and cutting off the power company, among other subjects. Its 68 pages are illustrated, and one even contains a sample weatherstripping material. Send $1.95 plus 30¢ for postage and handling with your request to the Grist Mill, Energy Conservation Services, 90 Depot Rd., Eliot, Me. 03903.

Reference guide

Specialists' Choice, a 48-page bibliography which represents the subject expertise of over 40 reference specialists, is the product of last May's New Reference Book Roundup in Washington, D.C. Entries were selected from the spectrum of contemporary reference works. Subjects covered include the arts, humanities, and natural and social sciences from African to Women's Studies. Copies may be obtained for $1 from Robert Zich, 3717 Livingston St., N.W., Washington, D.C. 20015.

Small press source

The attractively printed catalog prepared by the Friends of Books and Comics for the Third International San Francisco Book Fair in July is available. It lists over 200 small presses throughout the country, with emphasis on ones on the West Coast. The listings are annotated with short descriptions of the philosophy of each press and titles published. A history of the Friends and its influence on Bay Area small presses is included. Send 25¢ to cover postage and handling with your request to the Friends, 330 Ellis St., San Francisco, Calif. 94102.

Gay guide

Sexual Minorities: Serial Sources of Information on Male Homosexuals, Lesbians, Transvestites and Transexuals Held by the Labadie Collection of Protest Literature lists 127 serial titles and holdings of the University of Michigan. Edmund F. SantaVicca, the compiler, notes that the library collection is the sole one which is comparable to that of the Kinsey Institute. The 11-page publication costs $1 from Mr. SantaVicca, c/o School of Library Science, University of Michigan, Ann Arbor, Mich. 48104, through April 1976.

Strip mining study

Inclusive collections of environmental materials would benefit from the addition of Illinois Lands Surface Mined for Coal, by Ronnie J. Haynes and W. D. Klimstra of the Cooperative Wildlife Research Laboratory of Southern Illinois University. Undertaken for the Illinois Division of Land Reclamation, the study tabulates the total stripped acreage found in the state as of June 1971. Acreage is classified according to ownership, locations, companies that mined the land, types of affected areas, natural fertility classes prior to mining, methods of mining, etc., and defines the location of problem areas. The 201-page publication includes figures, photographs, and detailed tables. It will be provided free upon the receipt of a 13″ x 10″ self-addressed envelope bearing 26¢ postage. Send requests to Mr. Klimstra, Director of the Laboratory, University of Carbondale, Carbondale, Ill. 62901.

Public records directory

Guide to New York City Public Records covers nine major types of records located in Manhattan: business, court, election, general reference, health care, housing, personal information, real property, and welfare. It was compiled by the New York Public Interest Research Group, Inc., a nonpartisan research and advocacy organization established, directed, and supported by New York State college and university students. The group hopes this book is a first practical step in expanding public access to governmental records. The 60-page, indexed publication costs $3 from NYPIRG, 5 Beekman St., Rm. 410, New York, N.Y. 10038. Bulk rates are available upon request from Tom Caulfield at the address above.

Medical ethics

Selected Bibliography on Medicine and Morality, prepared by the library staff at Florida Technological University, grew out of two series of programs concerning medical advances and the problems in ethics they posed. The entries are listed alphabetically by author under general subject headings, which include control of birth; control of death; control of quality of life; zen, yoga and acupuncture; population control and the right to parenthood; behavioral control, psychosurgery, and the patients's rights; limited resources and the right to prolong life. The 27-page pamphlet supersedes a 1974 edition. Copies are available free while the supply lasts. Send requests to L. W. Walker, Director of Libraries, Florida Technological University, Box 25000, Orlando, Fla. 32816.

Library brochure

The University of Colorado Libraries' attractively printed brochure, Guide for the Faculty, stresses the instructional services offered by the libraries both in and out of the classroom. Copies are available to those sending a self-addressed 9″ x 12″ envelope with 20¢ postage to Ms. Lenore A. Martinez, Administration Office, University of Colorado Libraries, Boulder, Colo. 80309.

LJ MAGAZINES

Bill Katz, PROFESSOR, SCHOOL OF LIBRARY SCIENCE, STATE UNIVERSITY OF NEW YORK, ALBANY

Sunbury

1974. Three issues a year. $5. Ed: Virginia Scott. P.O. Box 274, Jerome Ave., Station, New York, N.Y. 10468. Aud: Ac. (Subject: Little Magazines. Women. Issues examined: Nos. 1-3, 1974-75)

While a little poetry magazine in its broadest definition, this is really a title for the feminist collection. Of the close to 40 entries in an average 80-page issue, almost all are women. A number are teachers, as is the editor, and a few such as Marge Piercy, Siv Cedering Fox, Lynn Schwartz, and Barbara Unger are well known. Yet the real importance of Sunbury is the emphasis on talented poets who are less recognized. The selection shows an empathy with women poets who identify closely with place and are able to express sometimes moving personal experiences in poetry. An important entry for the general poetry collection, certainly for the library with an emphasis on meaningful feminist magazines.—BK

Now Voyager

1975. Quarterly. $4. Ed: Vincent McCaffrey. 193 Beacon St., Boston, Mass. 02116. Illus. Aud: Ejh. (Subject: Children: For Children. Issue examined: Vol. 1, No. 1, 1975)

A 42-page magazine on newsprint which is subtitled "the story magazine for young people," this consists of six short stories for ages of about eight to 14. Authors in the first number: Dorothy Marshall, John Dagenais, Robert Dickoff, Elizabeth Pennell, Branley Branson, and Thomas Owen. Each yarn opens with a full-page black and white illustration. The editor carefully points out that the magazine is "not an educational vehicle," but the level and the interests of the stories should do much to convince even the most reluctant reader that there is some joy in reading. In view of the lack of adequate fiction magazines for children and Now Voyager's relative average of excellence, it can be recommended. BK

Best Friends

1971. Annual. $2. Best Friends Poetry Collective, Albuquerque, N.M. 98110. Illus. Aud: Ac, Ga, Hs. (Subject: Women, Poetry. Issue examined: No. 3)

Best Friends is another feminist magazine which we have seen go from an inexpensive, unpolished format in 1971 to a fine poetry magazine with aspirations of becoming a semiannual instead of an annual. Best Friends leans toward the literary; it does not represent the feelings of the angriest young women. But the review does publish poetry which would never get into conventional places; there is still a need for underground feminist magazines. The magazine was started by, among others, Sharon Barba, co-editor of a 410-page women's anthology, Rising Tides; her work still occasionally appears in the magazine. There are several poems by each poet, and superior graphics on fine quality paper. One of the older feminist journals which has been, and will be, a starting place for talented women poets.—Margaret Kaminski, Detroit Public Library

Elima

1973. Biannual. $4. Ed: Annie Gottlieb. 149 West 4th St., Apt. 5D, New York, N.Y. 10012. Illus. Aud: Ac, Ga, Hs. (Subject: Women, Little Magazines. Issue examined: Vol. 1, No. 1, 1973)

Physically resembling its older sister Best Friends, Elima is more primeval, getting its name from a Pygmy female puberty ritual. Perhaps the name represents the female creative unconscious, and this theme is extended into the first issue's poems, prosepoems, stories, articles, and interviews. It also emphasizes the introspective: autobiography, letters, and journal and notebook writing. In all, women are taking themselves seriously as artists and writers. Some material is reprinted from other sources, i.e. illustrations and designs taken from the art of ancient civilizations have been chosen to complement the themes of primitivism and mysticism. Other art work is original. The quality of the first issue, as well as the writing already collected for future issues, suggest that Ms. Gottlieb, formerly of Harcourt, is making good use of her contacts. Elima promises to rank with Aphra as one of the most esoteric of women's journals.—MK

Two new recommended guides for periodical librarians and writers seeking information on who publishes what include William Camp and Bryan Schwark's Guide to Periodicals in Education and Its Academic Disciplines (2d ed. 568p. Scarecrow, 1975. $19.50; also, Darlene Arnold and Kenneth Doyle's Education/Psychology Journals: a Scholar's Guide (143p. Scarecrow, 1975. $6).

Camp and Schwark list 600 American titles, arrange them by subject, and include a title index. Full bibliographical data is given, along with detailed information on editorial policy (which here amounts to a noncritical descriptive content annotation), manuscript preparation, manuscript disposition, and copyright. Information is as current as it is accurate, and thanks to the editorial policy statement the book will be useful for periodical librarians seeking information about an out-of-the-way title not annotated elsewhere.

Arnoid and Doyle limit themselves to 122 journals with pretty much the same type of information. A nice addition: "acceptance rejection criteria," as well as publisher policy on reprints. More concise than Camp and Schwark, Arnold and Doyle arrange titles alphabetically and conlude with a subject index.

Since the phrase "Its Academic Disciplines" in the Camp and Schwark title includes psychiatry and psychology, there is heavy duplication of titles between the two guides. Large research and academic libraries may want both, although if a choice is to be made Camp and Schwark would be first, particularly because of the detailed reports on manuscript preparation. Smaller libraries will do quite well with Arnold and Doyle, and even thank the authors for constraint of selection. A comparison between the two titles shows the compilers agree about most details, particularly one: scholarly journals not only refuse to pay writers, but 98 percent of them now have the gall to charge authors for proof corrections and for reprints.

Late in 1974 another guide to periodicals was issued. This is Gary L. Harmon and Susanna M. Harmon's Scholar's Market (723p. Ohio State Univ. Libraries). The compilers examine periodicals which publish literary criticism, history, or bibliography. Donna Gerstenberger and George Hendrick's Fourth Periodical Directory of Periodicals Publishing Articles on English and American Literature and Language (4th ed. Swallow, 1974. pap. $3.50) is much more manageable, listing approximately 650 titles as compared to 848 in the Scholar's Market. Also, the Gerstenberger list is 233 pages, the Harmon 723 pages—primarily because of an unfortunate bulk format. Large academic libraries will want Harmon, but smaller libraries need only the Gerstenberger guide.

The State Historical Sociey of Wisconsin is the publisher of the much reviewed (LJ, February 1, 1975, p. 270) and equally praised Undergrounds: A Union List of Alternative Periodicals in Libraries of the U.S. & Canada by James P. Danky. Issued in late 1974, this is a substantial 205-page paperback priced at $12.95. The list is arranged alphabetically by title with a geographical index. Don't miss Danky's introduction—a fine summary of the underground press past and present, and an explanation of why even the most patient of compilers can't come up with such data as beginning date for the unruly undergrounds. All research, academic, and large public libraries should have this right next to the Union List of Serials.—BK

Kaiser, Robert G. Russia: the people and the power.

Atheneum. Jan. 1976. 482p. index. ISBN 0-689-10696-3. $12.95. SOC SCI/INT AFFAIRS

Washington Post journalist Kaiser, assigned to the U.S.S.R. for three years, has written an informal Soviet area studies text, the purpose of which is to give "a plausible explanation of Soviet life and society written for a curious amateur." It's true that much of the information can be found scattered in the recent deluge of literature about or by Soviet dissidents or in popular accounts by travelers or journalists; but Kaiser's book conveniently presents the information in a single source, and covers all aspects of the Soviet Union's social and political system. The author gives fascinating and previously unreported facts about such topics as abortion, public bathing, childbirth, old age, and health care. Although his conclusions about Soviet foreign relations are controversial, nevertheless they are well argued. A well-written introductory learning tool.—Pamela J. Hersh, Librarian, New Jersey State Dept. of Education

Ladd, Everett Carll, Jr. with Charles D. Hadley. Transformations of the American Party System: political coalitions from the New Deal to the 1970s.

Norton. 1975. 384p. illus. index. $12.50. HIST/POL SCI

Ladd and Hadley present a lively analysis of the past, present, and probable future condition of the American party-electoral system. They marshall convincing evidence to show how societal changes gradually have unraveled the stable electoral coalitions forged during the New Deal era; the result has been political uncertainty and instability. The authors find that the volatility associated with recent past national elections is likely to persist in the immediate future. This is an important volume that challenges, supports, and extends arguments advanced in such books as Walter Burnham's Critical Elections and the Mainstream of American Politics (LJ 2/1/71), John Saloma and Frederick Sontag's Parties (LJ 8/72), and J. L. Sundquist's Dynamics of the Party System (LJ 10/1/73).—Edward C. Dreyer, Dept. of Political Science, Univ. of Tulsa, Okla.

Norton. Jan. 1976. 320p. photogs. ISBN 0-393-05568-X. $8.95. BIOG/POL SCI

As Lippman, a journalist, makes clear from the beginning, this book is not a full biography of Edward Kennedy but rather a study specifically of his work as a U.S. Senator. Kennedy's successes and failures in his major areas of legislative and investigative interest are examined, and his style of operation also receives attention. The book has been compiled with the cooperation of Kennedy and his staff; it is, not too surprisingly, basically friendly to its main character, but Lippman is careful to include some pointed criticisms by Kennedy's opponents. In summary he presents Kennedy as a very successful promoter of liberal causes despite the latter's habit of taking undue credit for legislative ideas launched by others. Lippman also gives Kennedy well-deserved credit for his unwavering support of racial integration in the public schools at a time when many liberal politicians have softened or reversed their stand. Certainly of interest to libraries maintaining comprehensive collections on current politics.—Jack W. Weigel, Univ. of Michigan Lib, Ann Arbor

Schell, Jonathan. The Time of Illusion.

Knopf. Jan. 1976. 387p. $10. GOVT

In The Time of Illusion, Schell chronicles the 12-year prelude (1961 through 1973) to the national trial by ordeal—a trial which saw a nearly moribund legislative and judicial system give itself and the American system of government a new lease on life by subduing an almost overwhelmingly rampant Executive branch. Schell combines this chronology of Executive ascendancy with a discussion of "limited war" and its effect on American power and credibility; he also devotes much attention to the manner in which three Chief Executives regarded both the American people and those in the rest of the world. This is likely to become one of the classic accounts of the Vietnam–Watergate era, in that it affords a clear analysis of the period, without being encumbered by the attempts at self-justification that characterize many recent works. Robin J. Masters, Placentia Lib. District, Calif.

"Brothers discusses the 'butterfly years' after 40 in a discursive and entertaining manner. Her advice on dieting, exercise, sex, menopause, and marital happiness is sensible, practical, and widely applicable. If her column in Good Housekeeping sometimes seems sketchy and conservative, this book will shatter that image; here her opinions are timely and quite radical. The book will inspire many women to live up to their potential. For most public libraries."

ea. vol.: Dodd. 1975. 350p. illus. $10. MUSIC/REF

The first two volumes of a projected series designed to serve the musically oriented traveler as well as the student, scholar, and librarian as practical guides to all musical aspects of the continent. Each volume is introduced by a cogent essay outlining the significant musical heritage of the countries represented and describing the diverse kinds of musical resources located in each of their major cities. General musical guides and services, plus national holidays and music journals are included in these introductions. Then, for each major city are listed the opera houses and concert halls, libraries and museums, conservatories and other schools, musical landmarks, musical organizations, and various musical businesses such as dealers, publishers, instrument makers, etc. Each of the entries under these headings notes addresses, phone numbers, season dates, hours, and other appropriate information. Music Guide to Great Britain covers 26 cities in England, Scotland, Wales, and Ireland, while Music Guide to Austria and Germany focuses on Salzburg and Vienna plus 17 major cities of Germany. For the tourist and the scholar-librarian alike this is the first comprehensive source to offer a systematic approach to the resources of these European musical centers.—Stephen M. Fry, UCLA Music Lib.

Buncher, Judith F., ed. The School Busing Controversy: 1970-75.
Facts on File. 1975. 267p. index. LC 75-1737. ISBN 0-87196-359-0. $12.50; pap. ISBN 0-87196-360-4. $5.25. REF

The busing issue has been marked by continuing emotional arguments. Any book that provides accurate information on the controversy is therefore needed and welcome. This work's usefulness lies in its chronological summary of events. Coverage includes legal cases, politicians' statements and legislative roles, and public reaction in the form of editorials. Unfortunately, the book lacks a statement of scope and purpose; a fuller introduction that summarized pro and con positions would have placed the issue in a clearer context. Nevertheless the book has real value for subject collections.—Susan Phillis, formerly with Metropolitan Applied Research Center, Inc., New York

Scarecrow. 1975. 151p. LC 75-20159. ISBN 0-8108-0840-4. $6.50. CINEMA/REF
Forty anthologies have been indexed here for film titles, actors, actresses, directors, book reviews, and subjects. Some excellent collections are not covered because Heinzkill includes only anthologies that contain the writings of one critic. Among these, many already have their own index (i.e., those by Andrew Sarris, John Simon, Pauline Kael, Stanley Kaufmann, Dwight Macdonald). The index itself is flawed in that items listed under a person's name refer to the life and career but not to specific films. Similarly subject headings are to general discussion only. Thus, the entry "Expressionism" refers to a single anthology. Unless the reader knows to look under The Cabinet of Dr. Caligari as well, for example, he will overlook much additional material on the subject. Book reviews are limited to those within the particular anthologies. Not recommended.—Mark Piel, Upsala Coll. Lib., East Orange, N.J.

Presenting some 2400 entries, this one-volume encyclopedia offers ready access to basic information, and it will be most useful to school, junior college, and general libraries. The majority of the entries are quite brief (approximately five lines) and they supply dates and nationalities for the painters, architects, and sculptors, as well as carefully edited summations of major contributions to the various fields of visual arts. The volume features abundant illustrations (including 250 in color) of good quality, as well as seven pages explaining styles and movements and a four-page glossary. Slide classifiers, cataloguers, and branch librarians will appreciate the compactness and the survey approach.—William J. Dane, Newark P.L.

Garland. 1975. 331p. index. LC 75-6887. ISBN 0-8240-1061-2. $20. HIST/BIBLIOG
More than 4500 English-language books concerned with Soviet affairs between October 1917 and the end of 1973 are cited in this bibliography. Generally, studies covering both the czarist and the Soviet periods are excluded. Most of the publications are American or British, but the works of many nations, including the U.S.S.R., are represented. Arrangement is by subject with a lengthy name index. However, a dull format makes the sequence of topics difficult to follow and use of the guide is sometimes difficult. Still, Jones's bibliography presents a wide variety of books and should be quite helpful to the beginning student or general reader who needs a point of departure for study.—Rena Fowler, Hoover Inst., Stanford Univ.

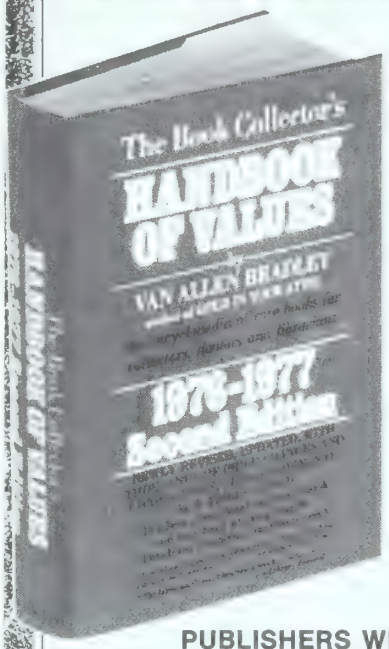
An indispensable reference for libraries– and librarians



Just published in a COMPLETELY REVISED, UPDATED, ENLARGED & RESET edition

PUBLISHERS WEEKLY'S rave review says it all:

"At a time when there appears to be a steady renewal of interest in the collecting of fine books and significant first or other editions, Van Allen Bradley's revision of his valuable guide is especially pertinent. The alphabetically arranged volume concentrates on the prices of books in the best available condition, since that is the category that matters in most transactions worthy of recording. The book deals primarily with 19th and 20th century titles from America and Britain. It is a solid reference in its large area, not only for the dealer and collector, but for the librarian, publisher, reviewer, and the many readers who may be curious about the approximate retail values of books on their own shelves. Introductory statements by Mr. Bradley give sound advice about price trends, dealers' markups, bibliography, first editions, 'points' that scholars and collectors pay attention to, and dealing with dealers.

"Thanks to extensive revision and updating, and a welcome, readable resetting, the volume fully replaces its predecessor, issued in 1972. The information on prices is the latest feasible up to the early months of 1975. More than 16,000 books are cited, including 1,000 not listed in the previous volume. Range of prices and basic bibliographical data are given for each book. Books are listed in a single alphabet by author (or by title if no author is named), but include volumes in many collected categories — classics, rare Americana, science and history, fine and private press books, colorplate books, modern firsts.

"Mr. Bradley is an old hand in the book trade, once a bookseller, for many years literary editor of the Chicago Daily News, and author of 'Gold in Your Attic' and 'More Gold in Your Attic,' which were derived from his syndicated column. His editor at Putnam is William Targ, experienced collector and producer of several bibliophilic anthologies and bibliographic references."—CHANDLER B. GRANNIS, Publishers Weekly

Water Resources of the World is a compilation of data for the major countries of the world. Information on stream flow, water demand, and, when available, other resources (e.g., water quality) is given for each country. A good index is provided, and the sources of all statistics are clearly indicated. Hydrologists, engineers, planners, and developers will find this volume useful. It is recommended for libraries serving these specialties and for larger academic libraries.

Solar Directory is a timely catalog of solar-energy activities in the United States. It includes descriptions of solar-heated and solar-cooled buildings, addresses of manufacturers and distributors of solar energy products, a directory of individuals and institutions involved in solar-energy research, and an annotated bibliography and list of information services. The arrangement and format of this mostly computer-generated book are a bit intimidating. Despite this shortcoming, it should be useful to both specialists and laymen.—*Robert J. Chilton. 1975. 206p. illus., some color. index. LC 75-10733. ISBN 0-8019-6411-3. $14.95. HORT/REF

Surely no offering as pathetic as this ever before masqueraded as an encyclopedia of gardening. Here we have an English translation of a German text on gardening that makes no reference to shade trees, dismisses conifers and evergreens in one page and ornamental shrubs in slightly more, and omits such stand-bys as hydrangeas, the common lilac, and the rose of Sharon. One looks in vain for dogwoods, magnolias, and crabapples. Many popular perennials are not discussed. The presentation of annuals fails to include larkspurs, petunias, and glove amaranths—and so it goes. The treatment of fruits and vegetables, lawns, and other phases of gardening is completely inadequate and at times misleading for American gardeners. The how-to advice is somewhat better. In sum, this is the worst book on gardening that I recall seeing in a long, long time.—Elizabeth C. Hall, Horticultural Society of New York Lib.

The authors have intentionally left out population, business, social, and economic statistics because they "thought it more important to know 10 times more about 10 artists or athletes than to know next to nothing about 100 of them." Instead there are 32 broad topics (predictions by psychics, little known facts about Presidents, highlights in the history of sex, sports oddities, etc.) treated in some depth. The result is a refreshing, readable, and highly interesting book that people will enjoy reading for pleasure—a book not easily put down. It's highly recommended for reference collections. It should not be chosen in place of standard almanacs, but rather as a supplement to them. As a ready reference tool, it has limited value, and some librarians will want a more exhaustive source. The index, when used in conjunction with the contents, should provide adequate access to the almanac.—Larry A. Miller, Moraine Valley Coll. Lib., Palos Hills, Ill.

The first part of this book consists of 501 color photographs (with numbers referring to the text) arranged by families of fishes. The second part gives descriptions of several thousand species in a dictionary arrangement, with 700 line drawings. Information given includes size, habitat, distinguishing features, and other interesting and useful facts. Entires are listed under scientific names, cross-referenced with common names. The photographs and drawings are mostly good and useful. An introduction describes fish generally, and there is a glossary with drawings illustrating the parts of a fish. Zingman, Barbara. The Dial: an author index.
Whitston. 1975. 266p. LC 75-8380. ISBN 0-87875-072-X. $18. LIT/REF

This volume appears not to be a complete author index. Although Zingman has neglected to include a statement of her aims, we do know she examined the Dial archives in order to determine authorship of "certain previously anonymous" book reviews. However, she does not indicate which ones were previously unknown, perhaps presuming copies of the Dial's own semiannual indexes are available. What is surprising is that she does not seem to have heard of the index (The Dial: Two Author Indexes, Southern Illinois Univ. Libs., 1971) of anonymous and pseudonymous contributors done by Nicholas Joost and Alvin Sullivan. Both indexers used the Dial papers in the Beincke Library at Yale and came up with different conclusions. Joost and Sullivan did more within their limited scope than has Zingman, and her volume is the poorer for not building on their work. Also, her arrangement leaves much to be desired (for instance, entries are chronological under an author's name and book reviews are listed under the reviewer's name but not also under the author's). A poorly conceived cumulative index.—Richard Heinzkill, Univ. of Oregon Lib., Eugene

New York Graphic Society: Little. 1975. 278p. photogs. bibliog. index. LC 74-21498. ISBN 0-316-03681-1. $19.95. ART
Andersen, a professor of art history at MIT, explores the history of American sculpture from 1930 to 1970—a formidable undertaking. He follows the traditional linear scheme of tracing art historical developments and art movements and stresses what he sees to be the essential continuing dichotomy between the aesthetic of Constructivism and that of Surrealism. The author's categorizing seems at times somewhat forced, and his text, stressing names, dates, and places as well as movements, is less than graceful. Nevertheless, Andersen's book is a useful addition to the literature, it is more comprehensive than Dore Ashton's Modern American Sculpture (LJ 5/15/69) and has a different scope than Jack Burham's more theoretical Beyond Modern Sculpture (LJ 11/15/68). And Andersen provides an excellent bibliography.—Margot Karp, Pratt Inst. Lib., Brooklyn

Braziller. 1975. 29p. 80 plates, mainly color. LC 75-10965. ISBN 0-8076-0805-X, $15; pap. ISBN 0-8076-0806-8. $8.95. ART

Comini, recognized for her excellent research on Klimt, Schiele, and fin de siècle Viennese art, focuses on the erotic nature of Klimt's elaborate jewel-like oeuvre. Referring to specific plates, (out of 139 total, the 46 color reproductions are striking), she demonstrates that erotic fertility symbolism (actually a simultaneous decorative façade), appears ubiquitously in both the landscapes and the renowned portraits. She also discusses Klimt's adaptation and transformation of a diverse range of art forms—Greek, Byzantine, Oriental—into his unique Viennese femme fatale genre. And she further analyzes Klimt's assimilation from contemporaries, such as Stuck, Makart, and Toorop. This readable, relatively inexpensive, and incisive volume is a recommended companion to Werner Hofmann's Gustav Klimt, these two volumes being sufficient for general collections. Comprehensive modern art collections, however, should first acquire Fritz Novotny's Gustav Klimt.—John Harvath Jr., Houston P.L.

Finch, Christopher. Norman Rockwell's America.
Abrams. 1975. 313p. illus., some color. index. LC 75-15703. ISBN 0-8109-0454-3. $35. ART

In this new Abrams volume on artist-illustrator Rockwell, the plates are arranged according to themes ("Growing Up," "Christmas," "Americans at Work") and the text offers serious comments on the really obvious narrative content of much of the work. Thomas Buechner, who prepared the mammoth Norman Rockwell: Artist and Illustrator (LJ 2/1/71), maintained that Rockwell's art "can be viewed as a popular history of America in the twentieth century—as revealing in its omissions as in its inclusions (no Prohibition, no Depression, no Korea or Vietnam; plenty of baseball, presidential campaigns, and recently, civil rights)." Finch, however, accepts Rockwell's cheerful American myth much more at face value. But does anyone really care about text in an exercise in instant nostalgia? The book is handsome, and libraries not able—or willing—to purchase the much more extensive Buechner volume might well consider buying this present book.—Margot Karp, Pratt Inst. Lib., Brooklyn

Potter, dist. by Crown. 1975. 150p. illus., some color. index. LC 75-10943. ISBN 0-517-52380-9. $12.95. ART

A comprehensive historical survey of female involvement in the visual arts. The discussions are necessarily brief, but the author does provide basic biographical data and objective criticism on significant individuals. Munsterberg includes female participation in all media from the "domestic arts" in primitive society to women's exceptional accomplishments in the field of photography. As is the case with most surveys, generalizations are rampant, and a resolution of the question "why have there been no great female artists" may not appeal to most liberals. Nevertheless, the prose style and the good reproductions make the volume suitable for most general collections.—Barbara A. Hornick, Univ. of Pittsburgh at Bradford Lib.

Yale Univ. Pr. 1975. 200p. illus. bibliog. index. LC 75-8441. ISBN 0-300-01891-6. $18.50. ARCHITECTURE

Forced to flee from Rome in 1527, the brilliant Florentine sculptor and architect J. Sansovino (1486-1570) successfully established himself in Venice. The foremost exponent of central Italian classicism in the city, he pragmatically accommodated his style to the heritage and exigencies of this unusual urban context. In this unique study, Howard analyzes—with lucidity and an easily borne erudition—Sansovino's creative adaptability. Without neglecting formal analysis, she considers his buildings not as isolated aesthetic objects but as projects intimately involved in the economic and social drama of their time. Thus the buildings are seen in relation to their function, typology, and site, and their sponsors' desires and wealth. This volume is not only a signal contribution to the understanding of a great talent, but an important methodological model.—Robert Cahn, Dept. of Social Sciences, Fashion Inst. of Technology, N.Y.

Van Nostrand Reinhold. 1975. 296p. illus. bibliog index. LC 74-14001. ISBN 0-442-21039-6. $27.50. CRAFTS

First published in Germany, this very complete book is an excellent survey of the art of metalwork, both its history and crafting. Exploring all areas of metalsmithing from the functionalism of flatware to hand-formed silver jewelry, the author eliminates the arbitrary distinctions between types of metalwork and blends the whole into one aesthetic discipline. And his writing style is highly readable. While liberally illustrated with black-and-white photographs, nothing produced after 1965 is included, the only deficiency in an otherwise excellent book.—Judith Ellyn Wegener, Monroe County P.L., Bloomington, Ind.

Illes, Robert E. Men in Stitches.
Van Nostrand Reinhold. 1975. 136p. illus., some color. index. LC 74-22512. $13.95. CRAFTS

Besides being witty to read, this is a solid "how-to" book in which the author has articulated very well the pitfalls of the designing and working of rugs, treating areas many rugcraft books take for granted. The detail with which Illes explains aspects of color and design (e.g., "separation of colors within a design" and "outlining intricate designs") makes the book most valuable to any reader wishing to choose designs other than those represented here. While the title implies that the book is for men, it is an excellent guide for anyone and it is certainly fun to read. Also included are instructions for building an adjustable hooking frame. There are numerous step-by-step illustrations.—Lois Horowitz, Univ. of California Lib., San Diego

Smith's beautifully illustrated and very useful book has been long awaited by bookbinders and collectors familiar with his work. With an introduction by Edgar Mansfield, the binder who brought bookbinding into the 20th Century artistically (technically, some aspects of bookbinding have not changed for centuries), and with contributions from many of England's and Europe's outstanding binders, Smith's book serves as an up-to-the-minute manual for other binders and as a statement of a particular philosophy of bookbinding as an art: integrity includes reflection of content in design. Smith is original. He has created a new material, "maril," for use in his bindings. He has bound seven sets of Lord of the Rings so that each of the 21 volumes stands alone as a work of art, but also so that they stand together as a "book wall," front and back covers contributing to two huge designs. Smith illustrates many of his own works here, but many books from other binders, too. Highly recommended.—Bonnie Jo Dopp, San Francisco P.L.

A collection of 28 "American images." Emphasis is on the American Revolutionary era, with some 19th- and 20th-Century pieces. Tillett includes a Bicentennial medallion and a stunning circular sampler patchwork quilt. Four pages are devoted to each work: a photograph of the adapted design, a brief history and reproduction of the original work, the pattern directions, and material requirements. Of special interest is a chart that identifies compatible colors and the amounts of each required for a balanced composition. But 28 designs are a limited few in a book covering 200 years. The book is a great gift for the needlework buff but the librarian with limited funds might wait to see others (e.g., Needlework Nostalgia, edited by Barbara Weiland, LJ 8/75).—Olivia Opello, SUNY at Albany Lib.

Brightly written, this manual has the same objective as Harold L. Peterson's recent How Do You Know It's Old? (LJ 10/15/75) except that, instead of taking all kinds of antiques as its field, it concentrates on wooden furniture. Alphabetically, it considers the style, the backs, brass trims, dimensions, legs, drawers, nails, screws, even the smell—in 40 brief chapters (of two or three pages each); easy to understand, though it takes practice to Visitors inching along past the Whitney dollhouse on display at a posh New York department store exclaimed as they peered inside the beautiful little rooms—the smallness that always captivates those who like dollhouses worked its magic on the beholders. The Whitney dollhouse is a replica of the Kentucky home of the "Sonny" Whitneys (bought in 1951). Its history, traced with some improvising concerning the actual 150-year-old house, and careful detail are handsomely rendered in an oblong album. HUMOR GRAPHIC ARTS

This is a handsome book containing 330 cartoons specifically selected from American magazines of the last 75 years to show "how much art there truly is in the art of cartooning." A good, brief introduction lists the major elements essential for an effective cartoon. Except for the cartoons copyright by the New Yorker, there is no indication where the others were published and when. The index of artists shows that only 172 artists' works were used; it might have been more useful for research purposes if more examples of other cartoonists' works were included. This is a sophisticated collection, and it succeeds admirably in proving how well our American cartoonists can draw. I suspect most readers will use it for relaxation rather than serious contemplation of artistic techniques. Therefore, if your budget is limited, and you've purchased The New Yorker Album of Drawings (LJ 11/1/75), pass this by. If you've got (or are building) a collection of American cartoons, humor or contemporary drawing, then include this.—Laura Weissenberg, Scranton P.L., Pa.

A more positive critical reassessment of the significance of Millet's art is now emerging and will doubtless be furthered by the publication of this handsome sampling of his work. These drawings, chosen from the Louvre collections, represent only a small portion of Millet's graphic oeuvre. Bacou's informative essay dispels some of the clichés concerning the man himself, indicates something of the response of contemporary and latter-day artists and critics, and provides an insight into his aesthetic theories and stylistic development. Superbly reproduced, the drawings are efficiently catalogued and discussed in relation to other drawings and paintings. Recommended for museum and larger graphic collections.—Robert Cahn, Dept. of Social Sciences, Fashion Inst. of Technology, New York

Rescued from obscurity in 1962, Bellard's memoir reveals his experiences as a private in the Union Army during some of the most critical campaigns of the Civil War. In writing this memoir, Bellard utilized his army diary, as well as letters and sketches preserved by his parents. The result is a fresh and engaging personal document. The vivid sketches, integrated with the text, enhance Bellard's prose account and display his talents as a primitive artist. The work has been edited with skill and sensitivity, and there are useful appendixes as well as historical chapter notes. A beautifully produced

"Babe" had a great year in 1927..... so did biology.

With the publication of its first volume in '27, Biological Abstracts set a standard for the developments of the next fifty years.

The "Babe" could be expected to "deliver in the clutch." BIOSIS too has met its challenges. The first volume of Biological Abstracts contained 14,506 abstracts for the year – we now cover more than that number in a month!

Ruth's impact was worldwide. So too for BIOSIS. More than 8,000 journals from over 100 countries are regularly scanned, translated (when necessary), abstracted and indexed.

In addition to his home run hitting, the "Babe" was a notable pitcher. Similarly, from the BIOSIS data base come microfilm, microfiche, and special abstract journals in Entomology, Mycology, and Health Effects of Environmental Pollutants. Personalized awareness services are provided through our BioResearch Today and Standard Profiles services.

As the "Babe" played for the Red Sox and Yankees, BIOSIS serves all of the subject interests of biology and biomedicine with subject emphases in more than 500 areas.

George Herman "Babe" Ruth led the American League in home runs for 12 years in a 22 year career. BIOSIS' ability to serve the information needs of biology and biomedicine makes our services leaders every year.

Cook, Fred. Julia's Story: the tragedy of needless death.
Holt. Mar. 1976. $6.95. MEMOIR
Journalist Cook's insightful recounting of his wife's mortal struggle with a heart ailment he feels could have been healed had there been better coordination among those who treated her is a constructive call for reform. "In the splintered American medical system," he says, "nobody talks to anybody"—a conspiracy of silence protects and isolates the arcane ministrations of specialists while preventing either the patient or concerned observers from acquiring essential information. A lack of postoperative care—neglected in the euphoria following successful surgery—ultimately caused Julia's death. Cook cites additional cases and offers proposals for reform. A potentially controversial addition to the widening body of literature about the crisis in health care, and an affirmation of the dignity of a life in its most tenuous hours.—*Paul G. This is a narrative about the premature birth of two babies and the death of one. The book dwells on the physical and emotional changes during a pregnancy marred by complications, as well as the interaction of the parents and the hospital staff. There is nothing very profound or unique about the story except to the author–mother and the immediate family. The specimen in the pickle jar, an anxious husband pounding on the delivery room door after being denied entry by the doctor, the frustrated mother restrained by hospital rules from caring for her premature infant—these are the personal, human touches intended to add warmth to the story, yet even these fall a bit flat.—*Ruth E. Sam Keen, best known for his numerous contributions to Psychology Today and his book To A Dancing God, shares with us the "travel log" of his own personal journey through a time of confusion and struggle to new meaning and maturity. Consisting of almost daily memos he wrote to himself during this three-year period and amplified afterwards, the book contains brief paragraphs of thought, poems, family stories, and fantasies arranged in four sections. It is a moving, lucid, and penetrating account of "the places where I found an oasis, a helping spirit, a devouring demon, a rushing river or a tree with magical apples." More than a personal account, however, the book has a universal appeal to all who in the face of some radical turning point—adolescence, the death of a child or friend, disease, divorce, retirement—feel the need to begin again and can discover, with Keen, that "all life is a process of beginnings without end."—*Brewster Y. Copiously illustrated books on Johnson we have already, for example F. E. Halliday's Doctor Johnson and His World (Studio: Viking, 1968). But such books with texts that rival the pictures are rare, and rarest of all are modern books on Johnson written by women—perhaps because of some of Johnson's crankier remarks. The plates in this book, many in truly sumptuous color, are fine; but the text is also strong, finely written, and, if not particularly original or provocative, accurate and absorbing. And it is good to have a woman's view of, particularly, the women whose part was so large in Johnson's life. Lane gets round the obstacle of his mother by discrediting psychological interpretation, but she is persuasively sympathetic on Mrs. Thrale and, most interestingly, on Johnson's little-understood wife. The story of her adoption (while single) of two daughters—one Korean, the other Vietnamese—by Margolies, who currently works as a newsbroadcaster in Washington, D.C. Despite the strong credentials of both women (Gruber has written 10 other books and has worked with war orphans and refugees), the book is poorly written. It contains awkwardly reconstructed conversations and romanticized descriptions of people and places. Not since Leon Howard's Herman Melville (Univ. of California Pr., 1951) has a rival "definitive" biography appeared. Miller's work is, however, a serious effort at "inside narrative." Beginning in medias res, with Melville's fortuitous and finally disturbing acquaintance with Hawthorne in 1850, Miller traces the man's and the artist's odyssey into ultimate obscurity and silence lifted only by Clarel and Billy Budd. Miller emphasizes the emotional crippling by incompetent parents, sibling rivalry, unhappy marriage, and search for a father-figure (the identity he tried unsuccessfully to give Hawthorne). The biographical facts and their transformations in the works are abundant, but Miller's book essentially fails at a biography's central task—to vivify its subject. Often transition from "outside narrative" to psychoanalytical probe seems forced if not gratuitous. Unnecessary repetition complicates reading and compromises the result of Miller's diligent research and sympathetic insights. McGraw. 1975. 238p. index. LC 75-9814. ISBN 0-07-032063-2. $10.95. BUS
At a time when investing in the stock market is seen as providing high risk and problematical return, many people are turning to real estate as the safest and most profitable form of investment. Irwin immediately captures the reader's interest with the story of the Van Tills, who turned $1500 into $230,000 by using what Irwin calls the home reinvestment method. To simplify greatly, the method works like this: buy a piece of property which has potential but is priced less than comparable properties in the same area because of its condition; fix it up; sell at a considerable profit; and reinvest in a more expensive property. In later chapters, Irwin explains various real estate forms, methods of financing, and tax shelter aspects of real estate investment. This fine book is clearly organized and well written, and is worth inclusion in most investment or real estate collections.—Holly Millard, Los Angeles P.L.

This is an account of America's first experience with price controls during peacetime, covering Phase II of the Nixon Administration's economic controls program. The authors write with considerable authority (Lanzillotti, for example, was a member of the Price Commission), and they show how much haste, and often confusion, was involved in making crucial decisions that would have profound impact on the economic health of the nation. Their most significant finding, however, is that the initiation and the dismantling of the entire wage-price controls program was motivated more by political necessities than by economic considerations. They conclude that after the 1972 Presidential elections, "it remained only to prepare a quiet grave for the controls apparatus." Nevertheless, the authors believe it is likely that some form of wage-price controls will become a permanent feature of U.S. economic policy. This is not a book for the general reader, but it will be highly informative for those concerned with governmental policies.—Harry Frumerman, Dept. of Economics, Hunter Coll., CUNY

At first glance, I assumed this was just another addition to the currently endless stream of writing intended for the newly liberated female. JACK BENNY

AN INTIMATE BIOGRAPHY
By IRVING A. FEIN
Introduction by GEORGE BURNS

Millions of Americans laughed at "the world's worst violin player" and "the stingiest man in show business." But there was another Jack Benny—a gentle, generous, private man his public never knew. Now Benny's longtime friend and manager reveals that very special human being in a delightful book filled with personal stories and show business anecdotes. "The legions of Benny fans should follow this faithful and warmhearted record of his extraordinary career with keen interest."—Publishers Weekly.

Linnet: Shoe String. 1975. 146p. illus. index. LC 75-22321. ISBN 0-208-01421-7. $8.50. ED

This informative book provides administrators, faculty, and staff an ideal model to use in planning a learning center. Analyzing four services—library, audiovisual, instructional development, and learning activities—Peterson discusses independent studies, learning services for the handicapped, and tutorial programs, as well as the management of change and the development of personnel and instruction. The book not only defines the learning center, but also shows what purposes it serves and why it serves them better than random educational facilities. (A bibliography would have been helpful.)—John Johnson, Durham Technical Inst. Learning Resources Center, N.C.

This is a wide-ranging, much needed survey of the interaction between Europe and Africa throughout the history of contacts between the two continents. Colonial relationships necessarily form the central theme of the work, but the book also incorporates important data on such topics as the manner in which the European presence catalyzed various internal developments in Africa. The study is a balanced one, but the sections on the 19th Century—the period of the author's specialization—are particularly well done. The bibliography is sound. An important and well-written work on a vital topic, this belongs in all academic libraries.—James A. Casada, Dept. of History, Winthrop Coll., Rock Hill, S.C.

Garlinski, Józef. Fighting Auschwitz: the resistance movement in the concentration camp.

Crest: Fawcett. 1975. 416p. illus. bibliog. index. pap. $1.95. HIST

Writing in a straightforward, unemotional fashion, Garlinski attempts to dispel the myth of prisoner passivity in the most infamous of the Nazi death camps. He shows that the increasingly sophisticated resistance movement at Auschwitz brought hope to an almost hopeless situation; it initiated contact with the world beyond the wire barriers and employed ingenious techniques to help save lives. The author makes judicious use of some peculiarly complex sources. He provides very little analysis, but allows the facts to speak for themselves. His narrative reveals countless examples of the courage exhibited by those who resisted the barbaric world of the camps. A legitimate contribution to the enormous literature of the Holocaust.—Mark R. Yerburgh, SUNY at Albany Lib.

Syracuse Univ. Pr. 1975. 201p. index. LC 75-12295. ISBN 0-8156-0110-7. $10. HIST

This collection of original articles concerns women and social change within specified chronological periods; the essays focus on three main ideas—the growth of American feminist thought (covering the period of 1600-1800); the "cult of true womanhood"; and the "new woman" and social change. All of the essays are interesting and well-written, and they reflect sound research and documentation. Several essays draw on familiar sources but present new viewpoints, while other articles utilize previously neglected materials. Recommended, with the hope that these essays will suggest "new areas that can profitably be explored by a fresh approach to the data."—Mary Ann Miya, Loyola Univ. of Chicago Lib.

American Heritage, dist. by McGraw. 1975. 416p. illus., some color. bibliog. index. ISBN 0-07-033057-3. $22.50. HIST

On the 200th birthday of the U.S. and at a time when Congress is defining its power in light of the so-called Imperial Presidency, it seems appropriate to present to the public a fresh history of that venerable institution. This work fulfills that need admirably. Josephy has written a clear, well-organized, and interesting history of the legislative branch from 1789 to 1975. The author uses chronological and topical approaches to trace the institutional development of Congress and to evaluate its relationship with the Presidency, and he reminds us that Congressional "crises" of power are not new to our times. The text is enlivened with interesting personal sketches, illustrations, maps, portraits, and cartoons.—Dorothy D. Siles, Holden, Mass.

This readable and informative survey brings together a great many historical details. Interweaving personal letters, diaries, military directives, and correspondence, the book not only recounts aspects of military dress but gives us insights into matters relating to daily military life and battle history. Univ. of North Carolina Pr. Jan. 1976. 296p. bibliog. index. LC 75-9751. ISBN 0-8078-1250-1. $13.95. HIST

Beginning in Texas in the 1880's, the Alliance spread quickly across the entire South and prairie states from 1888-1891 and then it disintegrated even more rapidly. McMath studies the Alliance's origins as a frontier social and aid group, and traces its growing involvement in statewide economic cooperation and eventually in political activity. He relates its techniques and goals to other farmer groups as well as to religious revivalism. He also explores the several causes of its decline, giving special attention to the sections of the Alliance that were channeled into the Populist party. The author makes judicious use of previously published works and new materials, and he offers much perceptive analysis. A fine work for scholars.—James Levin, Dept. of Special Programs, C.C.N.Y.

Syracuse Univ. Pr. 1975. 172p. bibliog. index. LC 75-23003. ISBN 0-8156-0111-5. $9.95. ECON/HIST

A well-written scholarly analysis of Philadelphia workingmen's politics from the Stamp Act crisis of 1765 to the adoption of the Pennsylvania Constitution in 1790. As self-employed craftsmen (they made up the largest socioeconomic group in the city), mechanics suffered from competition with English-made goods. Identifying home-manufacturing with patriotism, mechanics demanded nonimportation during the Stamp and Townshend controversies, thereby entering politics for the first time. Their "radicalism"—which Olton presents rather narrowly as economic self-interest—was not intended to overthrow political institutions or class relations; instead it represented an effort to change consumer attitudes and elicit government support. If Artisans too glibly reduces "radicalism" to nonideological, issue-oriented politics, it is nonetheless an important case study of 18th-Century urban affairs. And as such, it is useful for understanding economic tensions in the Revolutionary period.—Robert C. Twombly, Dept. of History, C.C.N.Y.

Ozment, Steven E. The Reformation in the Cities: the appeal of Protestantism to sixteenth-Century Germany and Switzerland.

Yale Univ. Pr. 1975. 237p. index. LC 75-8444. ISBN 0-300-01898-3. $12.50. REL/HIST Ozment begins by sketching the trends in Reformation research, confronting especially Bernd Moeller's ideas, whose Imperial Cities and the Reformation (Fortress, 1972) he takes as a point of departure. The author then explores the religious attitudes of the lay people on the eve of the Reformation, conveys the different ways in which the original Protestant message was heard by them, and finally deals with the process by which it was enacted in the cities. His arguments are supported by citations from primary sources, utilizing both Catholic and Protestant popular literature of the period such as catechisms, tracts, manuals, and drama. This well-researched and well-organized volume—tough going for nonscholars—makes a significant contribution to the debate concerning the spread of the Reformation.—Peter DeKlerk, Calvin Theological Seminary Lib., Grand Rapids, Mich.

Rubenstein, Richard L. The Cunning of History: mass death and the American future.

Harper. 1975. 160p. ISBN 0-06-067013-4. $7.95. HIST

"Why should anyone bother to reflect once again on the extermination of Europe's Jews by the Germans thirty years ago?" In this fashion, this book opens with a question never satisfactorily answered. The Holocaust, according to the author, evolved out of the tension between a highly refined and rationalized German bureaucratic machinery facing a "surplus people" (those systematically denationalized) problem. The entire process was aided, albeit innocently, by the Jews themselves who were ". . . conditioned by their religious culture to submit and endure." Rubenstein's purpose appears to be to warn us against the growth of our own large bureaucracy. The logic of the argument is tenuous at best. There have been myriad large bureaucracies through history and few have pursued "mass death" as state policy. The book adds little to our understanding of history or ideas. Compared with such recent scholarship as Lucy S. Dawidowicz's The War Against the Jews, Rubenstein's work is particularly barren of both details and research.—Michael Fenenbock, Director, Career Education Programs, Northern Plains Consortium Colls., Jamestown, N.D.

Academic Internat. Pr. 1975. 286p. index. ed. & tr. by Robert F. Price. LC 74-81637. ISBN 0-87569-062-9. $15. HIST

Soviet leaders dread the possibility (no longer remote) of a Sino-Japanese alliance in East Asia which might seriously undermine their power position. Sladkovsky, an authoritative Soviet academic administrator and scholar, has written a brief parallel history of China and Japan from the beginning of their recorded history until 1971 together with an account of their mutual relations during this same period. As a view of contemporary Soviet attitudes toward China and Japan this book is less than satisfactory. Intended for a mass Russian audience, it presents mostly a dreary succession of simplistic generalizations which fail to reflect the true level of Soviet scholarship. Sladkovsky's discussions of economic history (his specialty) are much better. Unfortunately, the translator has mixed up too many of the Chinese names.— *Steven I. Univ. of California Pr. 1975. 377p. LC 74-76393. ISBN 0-520-02724-8. $20. ECON/HIST

Webster holds that the years 1911-1915 were "pivotal" for Italy, because the claims of an expansionist, nationalist Italy finally overrode those of a liberal and democratic one. The symbol of the victory of Nationalist forces on the far Right was the exclusion of parliament from the decision for war in 1915. The particular subject of Webster's fine study is the manner in which the ruling economic and political oligarchies of the Right coalesced in support of nationalist economic and foreign policies. Thus heavy industry and big banking maneuvered at home between parliamentary elites and the "permanent nation"—the monarchy and the military and professional classes—to secure protectionism and state subvention and abroad they worked to secure imperialist economic penetration of the Balkans and the Ottoman Empire. It looks rather like the play that was being staged in Germany at the same time, only with shabbier sets and a smaller cast. Fascism, Webster makes clear, was something more than a movement of the petite bourgeoisie, as it drew much of its support and many of its programs from the far Right.—*John G. Williamson, Yale Univ. Doubleday. 1975. 241p. ed. & intro. by Don Russell. photogs. index. LC 74-18887. ISBN 0-385-02123-2. $9.95. HIST

Although the cowboy is the stereotypical symbol of the American West, the steam locomotive is actually a much truer symbol; it was, in fact, the railroad that created the West and for half a century (1870-1920) dominated the region's political and economic structure. The essays in this collection aren't intended as a complete history of that railroad era; but by focusing on typical railroads, persons, and events they do recreate vividly the milieu of that period. Inevitably there is some unevenness in writing and occasional repetition, and the dedicated rail or Western history enthusiast will find little new here. But general readers, including young adults, will appreciate this entertaining overview of Western railroading's golden age.—Paul B. Cors, Univ. of Wyoming Lib., Laramie

In this well-researched study, the author combines quantitative data gleaned from the U.S. Census reports and from secondary materials to produce a survey of state and local government during 1850-1860 in Arkansas, Tennessee, Kentucky, Missouri, North Carolina, Virginia, and Maryland. Wooster deals with legislatures, governors, courts and judges, and county officers and justices of the peace; for each section he provides a historical overview and constitutional basis for the office, as well as statistical data concerning the officeholders themselves. In a brief summary chapter he offers the conclusion that "the number of property holders and slaveholders among southern officeholders was increasing" at the same time many democratic advances were being attained by "the white masses." Wooster also includes a lengthy and valuable bibliographical essay, plus 43 pages of supplementary statistical information.—Paul D. Casdorph, Dept. of History, West Virginia State Coll., Institute

Routledge & Kegan Paul. 1975. 335p. illus. bibliog. ISBN 0-7100-7963-X. $37.50. ARCHEOLOGY

Eminent European archaeologists (usually the excavation directors themselves) have contributed chapters for this volume on the Palaeolithic site at Vértesszöllös, Hungary; the Neolithic Netherlands community at Elsloo; Celtic sites at Heuneburg, West Germany, and Entremont, Provence, France; Bronze Age to Saxon occupation at Mucking, Essex, England; Viking fortresses in Denmark; trading sites at Helgö, Sweden, and Bryggen, Bergen, Norway; and regal centers at Mikulčice, Czechoslovakia, and Ostrów Lednicki, Poland. An important chapter on European Russia surveys fieldwork on a whole range of sites there. As some of these excavations are ongoing while others are much older, the term "recent" seems very broadly defined; still, much of this material is not readily available in English. Although this otherwise useful work lacks an index and contains annoying errors in textual references to illustrations, libraries with archaeological collections will want it anyway provided they can afford it. *Priscilla Wegars, Claremont Junior H.S. Oxford Univ. Pr. 1975. 266p. + 45 illus. fwd. by Chief A. Y. Eke. bibliog. index. ISBN 0-19-920063-7. $37.75. ARCHAEOLOGY

The art of Benin has been long celebrated, but until recently most of the history of the city has been based on myth. This volume (which has many supplementary sections of specialists' analyses) represents the bulk of the most complete archeological reconnaisance of the site to date, done under the auspices of the Nigerian Federal Department of Antiquities. However, as Connah points out, the relatively continuous occupation of the site as well as the archeologically destructive environment have apparently eradicated a wealth of potential knowledge. In this regard, it is a pity that more extensive excavation has been left for the future. The research documented here is thus important for what it has accomplished but disappointing in light of what could have been done.—Jeffrey H. Schwartz, Dept. of Anthropology, Univ. of Pittsburgh

These books offer practical, do-it-yourself ideas to today's houseperson. The approach of each, however, is different. Stark's is on the order of Bennett's Chemical Formulary, while Tarr's is akin to Hints from Heloise. For example, Stark's recipe for home-brewed shampoo includes oleic acid, coconut oil, and triethanolamine. Tarr has a less complicated approach: mix a little dishwashing detergent with a raw egg!

Stark writes basic "consumer chemistry." He offers simple formulas for solutions that will help with home upkeep and repair, personal grooming, automotive and mechanical maintenance, gardening, animal husbandry, etc. The appendixes (11 in all) are most helpful and include such things as a chemical source listing (i.e., do you buy it from a drugstore, grocery, or chemical supply house?) and definitions of chemicals used in the book.

Tarr's book is primarily a cookbook with household recipes as a sidelight. Disillusioned with today's commercialism, food additives, and high prices, she attempts to get back to basics, and gives recipes for making from scratch dry mixes (for baked goods), cheese, wine, sausage, and yogurt. Other subjects include economy meals, gardening tips, household cleaning hints, recipe ingredient substitutes, etc. The book is a glorious hodgepodge of ideas for the homemaker with time to spare (most recipes require a bit of extra effort).

Both books should be considered for purchase especially by public libraries. Callie B. McGinnis, Columbus Coll. Lib., Ga.

Morrow. 1975. 262p. index. recipes by Roberta Wolfe Smoler. LC 75-17827. ISBN 0-688-02954-X. $9.95. COOKERY

The two parts of this book are very different: Smoler has provided a sophisticated collection of recipes which are very pleasing but can, for the most part, be gotten elsewhere. Larmoth's essays on life, food, and eating serve as a frame for the recipes, hold the book together, and give it its character. The essays deal mostly with her experiences traveling in Europe. Despite Larmoth's passionate virtuosity I find the matter too stylishly thin to recommend the book. I prefer the more substantial writing of Joseph Wechsberg and Calvin Trillin.—Johanna Ezell, Washington County Free Lib., Hagerstown, Md.

S. & S. 1975. 381p. index. LC 75-4686. ISBN 0-671-21946-4. $9.95. COOKERY

Lucky the people who are invited to the Pépins' for dinner. Pépin, once chef de cuisine to de Gaulle, presents the recipes he likes to prepare for his guests, along with a list of suggested menus. The recipes are very French and very good. His ideas about what to do with potatoes are better than any I have seen in a long time and his dessert recipes are extraordinary. The one I tried, tarte à l'orange, was as good as it was beautiful. Occasionally, but only occasionally, the instructions are not altogether clear, although experienced cooks should be able to work them out. It is too bad that the publisher skimped badly on the quality of binding and paper, which looks to be just a cut above newsprint. But that is not Pépin's fault and this is a fine book that will inspire any good cook.—Ruth Diebold, Finkelstein Memorial Lib., Spring Valley, N.Y.

Metropolitan Museum of Art. 1975. 144p. illus. index. LC 75-17859. ISBN 0-87099-133-7. $5.95. COOKERY

Medieval recipes offer the slimmest information on the assumption that the user knows what to do and need not be told. Thus, a recipe gives no indication of the amount of any ingredient necessary, requiring the cook to develop his or her own sense of proportions. Sass has taken 40 recipes from the 14th-Century cookbook Forme of Cury and adapted them for the modern cook. Among several curious dishes the most striking is a recipe for boiled garlic to be served as a vegetable. Ample information about medieval cooking is provided in the introduction and in the recipes themselves, and the author includes a list of suggestions for further reading. Nicely designed and illustrated, the book should appeal to those seeking a brief, unscholarly introduction to the cooking of medieval England.—*F. Alter, Robert. Partial Magic: the novel as a self-conscious genre.

Univ. of California Pr. 1975. 264p. index. LC 74-77725. ISBN 0-520-02755-8. $10. LIT

Alter shows, in a clear and sprightly way, that "novels have been doing rather more than prevalent critical assumptions allow for." He traces a tradition of novels which are not structured on realistic depictions of bourgeois life, but instead draw consistent attention to their own fictiveness. The tradition begins, of course, with Don Quixote, continuing with Sterne, Diderot, and a host of modern novelists. In demonstrating the "eclipse" of this form in the 19th-Century, Alter very neatly argues both historically and theoretically: writers like Balzac and Dickens, believing in their work as a form of historical and social commentary, would hardly wish to draw attention to artifice or fictiveness. In the 20th Century self-conscious novelists flourish once again, touched now by the methods and some (at least) of the interests of their 19th-Century predecessors. The self-conscious novel, finally and taken as a whole, is both inexhaustible and a meditation on death.—Ralph Flores, Dept. of English & Comparative Literature, Univ. of California, Irvine

Barnett, Louise K. The Ignoble Savage: a study in American literary racism, 1790-1890.

Greenwood. (Contribs. in American Studies). 1975. 288p. LC 75-16964. ISBN 0-8371-8281-6 $13.95. LIT

According to this study the frontier Romance rooted its racism in the Puritan image of the Indian as a child of Satan. Though some literature dealing with Indians meets with approval (Hawthorne's presentation of Puritan intolerance through them and Melville's explorations of the doubtful benefits of civilization, for instance), as a genre the frontier Romance is condemned as dealing with simplistic racist formulas rather than the richness of experience. Overall, the book may serve as an introduction to the development of the genre, and its alphabetical and chronological list of Romances will prove useful to those wishing to further pursue the subject; however, the conclusions and approach of the volume are by no means original. In addition, it presents an unfortunately one-sided view of the Puritans that appears, in part, to be based on misinformation and that verges itself toward stereotype.—*Henry J. Beck, Warren. Faulkner.

Univ. of Wisconsin Pr. 1975. 560p. LC 72-7982. ISBN 0-299-06500-6. $12.50. LIT

These 12 critical essays by an outstanding Faulkner scholar provide new insight into some of the most controversial aspects of Faulkner's life and writing. Through studious analyses of his philosophy, writing style, and environmental influences, and with added careful study focused on four major works (Go Down, Moses, Requiem for a Nun, The Mansion, and The Reivers), the author has produced a significant literary contribution that should be in every comprehensive collection of modern literature.—Joyce Taylor, Univ. of Mississippi Lib., University

Daniels, Les. Living in Fear: a history of horror in the mass media.

Scribners. 1975. 288p. illus. index. ISBN 0-684-14342-9. $13. CINEMA/LIT

This is essentially a historical survey of the horror story in literature and film, beginning with the Oresteia and ending with The Exorcist. Along the way there are side trips into the pulp magazines, old radio shows, comic books, television, and even pop music, but most of the book is devoted to literature and film. Daniels, who seems familiar with every horror film ever made, offers no new insights into the horror phenomenon, nor does he advance a thesis; instead he surveys and summarizes, book by book, story by story, and film by film, through the Gothic novel, the great 19th-Century masters of horror, and into the 20th Century. A pleasant feature of the book is that it contains several stories offered as samples at the ends of the chapters. A good solid work, a historical encyclopedia of horror.—Charles Bishop, Dept. of English, Univ. of New Orleans

Univ. of Texas Pr. (Symposia in the Arts & the Humanities) 1975. 247p. index. LC 75-16076. ISBN 0-292-72414-4. $10.95. LIT

Six essays presented at a symposium on modern British fiction at the University of Texas—and something of a grab bag at that. J. Hillis Miller (on Hardy's Tess), Avrom Fleishman (with a piece of the book that became the recent Virginia Woolf (LJ 4/1/75), and John Unterecker (on Durrell, Beckett, and Henry Green) are probably the best known contributors. My favorite paper is James C. Cowan's expert analysis of dualism in Lawrence's Ladybird, an essay with important implications for all of Lawrence's work. James Gindin treats ethical structures in Galsworthy, Elizabeth Bowen, and Murdoch; and Charles Rossman provides an intelligent reading of Joyce's Portrait. Neither the editor's introduction nor the transcribed panel discussion which serves as an appendix offers anything new about the historical phenomenon of literary modernism, but then that's rather a tall order. All in all, a fine commemoration of the symposium and a useful little collection.—Keith Cushman, Dept. of English, Univ. of Chicago

Quigley, Austin E. The Pinter Problem.

Princeton Univ. Pr. 1975. 294p. bibliog. index. LC 74-25627. ISBN 0-691-06281-1. $13.50. LIT

As an examination of Pinter's dialogue in The Room, The Caretaker, The Homecoming, and Landscape, this work breaks new ground. Quigley begins by discussing the ways in which language can carry information and then points out that Pinter's use of language is interrational rather than referential. This means that the way characters respond to one another through the dialogue determines the roles that they play toward each other, rather than the actual facts of their surroundings or the statements in the dialogue. In a scene-by-scene elaboration of this theory, Quigley is able to clear up many of the confusions that have constantly dogged critics and audiences. Quigley's language is sometimes dense and his style is not particularly graceful; but if the reader can bear with him, he has some useful things to say about Pinter.—Richard M. Buck, N.Y.P.L.

Univ. of North Carolina Pr. 1975. 248p. LC 75-11553. ISBN 0-8078-1252-8. $12.50. LIT

From a working conference convened by the English Department at the University of North Carolina in late 1972, comes this book on the problems, past achievements, and future objectives of the study of Southern literature from colonial times to the present. The format of the book follows closely that of the conference. There are major papers by such experts as Rubin, Arlin Turner, Lewis P. Simpson, and Richard Beale Davis; tape-recorded discussions and expansions of the papers; and an appendix of topics "suggested for further study." The papers are good. The taped discussions have been edited somewhat, but they constitute some of the best shoptalk about American writing and literary scholarship available anywhere, as might have been expected from a gathering that included the likes of Holman, Cleanth Brooks, Blyden Jackson, Walter Sullivan, and Lewis Leary, as well as the paper writers. Although primarily directed at students, the book has enough interest for larger public libraries as well as academic ones.—Arthur E. Jones Jr., Dept. of English, Drew Univ., Madison, N.J.

Stein, Richard L. The Ritual of Interpretation: the fine arts as literature in Ruskin, Rossetti, and Pater.

Harvard Univ. Pr. 1975. 314p. illus. index. LC 74-34540. ISBN 0-674-77125-7. $15. LIT

This impressive study isolates the Victorian literature of art—writing about painting, architecture, sculpture, and music—as an important genre and traces its development from Ruskin through Rossetti and Pater. At the center of the argument is the notion of the "ritual of interpretation," in which the "act of interpretation itself" takes on "almost religious value." In turn the "ritual" aims to reshape the perceptions and sensibility of the reader, for the Victorian poet and critic operated in a "public context." Ruskin's Modern Painters and Stones of Venice, Rossetti's "House of Life," and Pater's Renaissance are the main texts analyzed, but Stein ranges widely over the writings of all three of his writers. Although Stein's subject is highly specialized, he's well aware that he's tracing one of the paths to modern literature and aesthetics. He's no less impressive for the command of art history that accompanies his skills as a literary critic and historian. Advanced students of late Victorian culture will find this work a substantial and original contribution.—Keith Cushman, Dept. of English, Univ. of Chicago

Wagner, Geoffrey. The Novel and the Cinema.

Fairleigh Dickinson Univ. Pr. 1975. 394p. photogs. bibliog. index. LC 74-20939. ISBN 0-8386-1618-6. $15. CINEMA/LIT

It seems odd that a man so obviously intelligent and informed as Wagner would write a study so disjointed, lacking in grace, and strained. His sedulous attempt to illuminate the debt that the development of film owes to the narrative techniques of the novel is, ultimately, an inadequately synthesized collocation of film and literature theory, film-theory criticism, media comparison and differentiation (bolstered by much illustration and quotation), with an emphasis on the generic aesthetic peculiarities of the cinema and the novel. Along the way, notwithstanding recurring flashes of wit and insight, he rehashes the theories (and their putative weaknesses) of McLuhan, various linguists, aestheticians, and cultural critics. Even as one may share certain of his leanings and find others unconvincing, the approach seems too impressionistic and too wanting of tight argumentative development and discipline to yield satisfaction commensurate with the author's efforts.—*Elliot I. Engel, Lehman. Their Words Are Music: the great theatre lyricists and their lyrics.
Crown. 1975. 288p. illus. index. LC 74-80300. $14.95 MUSIC
Engel, author of several recent books about the musical theater, has put together an intelligently organized potpourri of lyrics encompassing almost 100 years of the American musical theater and with it a critical perspective of the genre. He explicates and evaluates some of the best efforts of Harrigan, Cohen, Hart, Porter, Sondheim, and many others, treating their lyrics as poetry. In a separate section Engel offers a sampling of lyrics by younger and as yet unproduced writers who study with him in his own workshops.—Stephen M. Fry, UCLA Music Lib.

St. Martin's. Feb. 1976. 287p. illus. $10.95. MUSIC
This first half of a two-volume study is concerned with Verdi's early works (although it overlaps into the second period with Rigoletto, Trovatore, and Traviata); the author considers seven out of the fifteen operas of the period he is studying. The chapter headings, each named after a central character or family group, indicate Godefroy's novel approach. In Trovatore it is Azucena rather than Leonora and Manrico, in Traviata the Germonts, father and son. Godefroy goes deeply into historical sources of the librettos, drawing parallels and contrasts (fully documented) with the dramas of Schiller, Dumas, Hugo, Byron, etc., and—with obvious affection and warm humor—he points out many hidden dramatic and musical details. This is not a book for the novice; it presupposes some familiarity with the operas. Charles Osborne, who has written an appreciative foreword, is the author of a complete guide to the operas (LJ 12/1/69), and for those who would go further, Spike Hughes' Famous Operas of Verdi (LJ 1/1/69) is recommended. But for anyone prepared to follow him, Godefroy provides fascinating reading.—Philip L. Miller, formerly with N.Y.P.L.

Lawrence, Vera Brodsky. Music for Patriots, Politicians, and Presidents: harmonies and discords of the first hundred years.
Macmillan. 1975. 480p. illus., some color. bibliog. index. LC 75-28041. ISBN 0-02-569390-5. $35 MUSIC
Patriotic tunes, political ballads, Presidential campaign songs, even a few songs of social protest are included in this handsome compilation. The collection is notable for its many facsimiles of music and verse, and for its fine full-page reproductions of sheet music covers. The accompanying text is clear and informative, though sometimes goes into too many insignificant details. This is a nice supplementary work but it is not a basic item for music collections or Americana. (The author has edited the works of Scott Joplin.)—Hillel Ausubel, New Rochelle P.L., N.Y.

Rosen, Charles. Arnold Schoenberg.
Viking. (Modern Masters). 1975. 106p. bibliog. index. $7.50; pap. $2.50. MUSIC
This is the first study of a composer in a series which has dealt with figures from widely varying disciplines. Rosen's approach to Schoenberg's music is more intellectual than sensual. He writes knowingly about the composer's stylistic phases: expressionism, atonality, serialism, neoclassicism. (Many will not agree that this last term should be applied to Schoenberg!) A brief, yet important chapter is devoted to the composer's idealistic Society for the Private Performance of Music. The book's final sentence is typical of Rosen's insights: "It would perhaps have given Schoenberg himself an ironic pleasure to think that the works in which nonmusical feelings were most deeply involved (e.g., Moses and Aaron) were the ones for which he developed the most satisfying abstract forms." Recommended for music libraries and large general libraries.—Dika Newlin, Sch. of Fine & Performing Arts, Montclair State Coll., N.J.

Körner, Stephan, ed. Explanation.
Yale Univ. Pr. 1975. 219p. index. LC 74-21348. ISBN 0-300-01827-4. $15. PHIL
This book consists of papers, comments, and replies of a conference on explanation. The main papers—by P. Achinstein, P. Geach, W. C. Salmon, and J. L. Mackie—are respectively about explanation in general, and teleological, theoretical, and ideological explanation. The papers are suggestive, clear, and well argued; and, with the exception of the comments on Geach's paper, the criticisms thereto raise issues which make for interesting controversy. Apart from the exception noted, there is an unusually high ratio of relevant to irrelevant commentary in both the criticisms and the replies. A volume well worth reading.

Lambridis, Helle. Empedocles.
Univ. of Alabama Pr. (Studies in Humanities, No. 13). Feb. 1976. 160p. prefatory essay by Marshall McLuhan. LC 73-22720. ISBN 0-8173-6615-6. $8; pap. $3.50. PHIL
Lambridis attempts a reconstruction of Empedocles, the pre-Socratic philosopher-poet. There is a chapter on his life and legend, his contemporaries, and each aspect of his philosophy. Treating both the philosophic content and poetic qualities of Empedocles' fragments, Lambridis gives us a readable and coherent account. Regrettably, he has a tendency to be long on partisanship for his subject but short on scholarly and philosophic acumen. For example, he not only suggests that Empedocles is "the greatest philosopher-poet of the ancient world," but he is also "the only philosopher (pre- or post-Socratic) to have acknowledged himself baffled by the gap between what he has conceived, and what it is possible to express adequately." See Plato's "Seventh Letter," for instance, where the inadequacy of language is discussed. A more judicious account of Empedocles that considers other scholarly opinions, (which this work does not), can be found in W. K. C. Guthrie's History of Greek Philosophy.—Wesley Teo, Dept. of Philosophy, Chicago State Univ.

Morris, Phyllis Sutton. Sartre's Concept of a Person: an analytic approach.
Univ. of Massachusetts Pr. Jan. 1976. 184p. bibliog. LC 75-8451. ISBN 0-87023-185-5. $10. PHIL
Interest in Sartre is generally confined to those interested in existentialism and little attention is given to his writings by philosophers of the analytic tradition. This situation should be corrected by Morris' book, which demonstrates the relevance of Sartre's writings to the issues discussed by analytic philosophers. Sartre's discussion of a person is presented in the terminology and context of analytic philosophy and comparisons are made between Sartre's thought and that of Shoemaker, Hampshire, Chisholm, Strawson in terms of such issues as personal identity, existence of other minds, and intentionality. Morris' study opens Sartre's writings to a new philosophy audience and in so doing helps remove the barrier between existentialism and analytic philosophy.—*Maurice L. Adcock, Betty. Walking Out.
Louisiana State Univ. Pr. 1975. 58p. LC 74-82000. pap. ISBN 0-8071-0154-0. $3.95 POETRY
It is not easy for a man to walk out into deep water, to leave safe houses and to try to find "the secret house inside my head." For a woman, the risks are even greater. There is, for example, the dark anxiety that neither she nor anyone else will find the self that grows within her "in time." There is also the realization that she has not been taught "how to wear, moving,/ a knife's two edges." Adcock's poems, however, make no plea for sympathy. Her hands flood "their maps with salt" as she holds the blade of a plow in "the eye of the lost/ farmwife's needle." Although she lives in a world of "jagged gates," where "the hours scatter ahead like wet animals" and where shadows set "the terms of the new death," she makes her sound "repeat itself in the tongue's tree." In this, a first, collection, the poet shows readers "how surfaces keep the swimmer up" and how a life of loving the right things is "long enough." Walking Out is a significant and beautiful book.

Brooks, Gwendolyn. Beckonings.
Broadside. 1975. 16p. pap. ISBN 0-910296-37-5. $2 POETRY
Brooks' emblematic choices are by now well known: her shift to Broadside Press, the new focus and voice she made for her work with In The Mecca, her commitment to the "new Black." She has said, "My aim, in my next future, is to write poems that will somehow successfully call all black people. . . . My newish voice will not be an imitation of the contemporary young black voice, which I so admire, but an extending adaptation of today's Gwendolyn Brooks' voice." In the dozen poems here she continues these convictions, commemorating her brother, and an anonymous death in her alley; celebrating love and a wedding; calling upon the young to "remember Afrika." It is unmistakably her voice, adapting, resonant. She honors language, and vitalizes it, as she has always done: her brother had "a talent for jeweling use and the usual,/ a talent for practical style." So does she, and white or black we are blessed by it.—Dabney Stuart, Poetry Editor, "Shenandoah"

Nathan, Leonard. Returning Your Call.
Pinsky, Robert. Sadness and Happiness.
ea. vol.: Princeton Univ. Pr. (Series of Contemporary Poets). Jan. 1976. 74p. $7.50; pap. $2.95.
POETRY

Both of these poets could be labeled "academic poets." Their work is formally strict and conservative, their voices are detached, polite, and, for the most part, subdued. Nathan more than occasionally pushes irony or parody to the breaking point. In a poem entitled "Confession" he says, "And you, you've got to be Joan of Arc./ . . . And you've come home from a hard day of torture,/ Dragging chains, still defying the Establishment." Of the two works, Pinsky's is perhaps the more complexly structured, the more mature. It is, like Nathan's, based on talk rather than imagery; it is rhetorical. In "Essay on Psychiatrists," Pinsky says, "They [people] talk and talk. . . ." And, at times, his talk (especially in the long title poem "Sadness and Happiness") drifts away into philosophical meandering. ". . . Shouldn't I vow/ to seek only within myself/ my only hire?" The work of both men is most effective when they turn their tolerant gaze outside themselves; for instance, in Pinsky's skillful poem "Discretions of Alcibiades" which ends: "But people on Cape Cod, the Costa Brava,/ Borneo, emulate gods and goddesses:/ . . . keep simple house/ Cooking red meat or fish on open fires;/ Market for salt; and dance to tinkly music." The gentle, unruffled tone of these two books convinces the reader that there are still some poets who, to quote Nathan, feel "secure in their privilege."—Lynn Emanuel, formerly with Dept. of English, C.C.N.Y.

Univ. of Chicago Pr. 1975. 110p. LC 75-5074. ISBN 0-226-57526-0. $7.95. POETRY

Let me chart a progress: intelligence, education, erudition, wit, irony. The path forks: comedy beckons yonder, tragedy there. The dubious miracle is that one can walk both ways at once, as Nemerov has always done. The destination may be called mind, a term that recalls the journey's starting place, and includes it, and may be the ground in which it occurs. I am speculative and abstract to echo these poems, their convolutions; but they are utterly concrete, too. That concreteness says that the universe is a mystery, and a riddle, two words indicating two modes of knowing, or not knowing. The leaves fall, the years return; a man circles, mixing the degrees of light he can afford to cast upon whatever falls. He gives shape, he speaks, he twines his love and grief. These primary actions Nemerov performs again, at the peak of mastery, and jeopardy. There are few books as valuable as this one.—Dabney Stuart, Poetry Editor, "Shenandoah"

Louisiana State Univ. Pr. 1975. 120p. illus. by A G. Smith Jr. LC 74-27198. ISBN 0-8071-0153-2. $6.95. POETRY

Oates uses poetry as the place to capture those moments of everyday life that have transcended themselves into symbolic meaningfulness. Her fiction is based upon similar premises (that these moments exist) but is enriched by both a profusion of them and by her thick, complex, quantitative prose style. Her poems have little to justify their standing alone. Weighty with significance, both implicit and explicit ("every man adores/ the woman who adores/ the Fascist"), they are created with a language that is always precise, careful, clear ("Your life is not prose: You didn't write it./ You don't even have to understand it") but that is too often oddly lifeless, verging on the banal: ". . . the ringing/ will anger the night and then subside/ to nothing: they will both listen then to nothing/ because this is what they wanted/ and this is what they got." The volume's two prose pieces are equally self-conscious but more interestingly written.—Suzanne Juhasz, Dept. of English, Univ. of Colorado, Boulder

Some of these poems are very good: spare yet vivid, using rhythm to catch and hold the reader, making their statement with no dead verbiage, having formal control without strict form. The small number presented (22 in 24 pages) shows each to most advantage, and supports those that falter some. A sample: "Quiet!/ Do not disturb him./ He is writing/ a poem.// One word/ from your mouth/ and his images/ will scatter/ like alarms." Small editions like this one, pamphlets easily and cheaply produced from typescript, are giving new voices an audience beyond that in the auditorium. Grossman, dist. by Viking. 1975. 60p. LC 75-17777. pap. ISBN 0-670-00598-3. $3.95. POETRY

Zukofsky began "A" as long ago as 1928. "A" 1-12 was first published in 1959 and reprinted in 1967. "A" 13-21 appeared in 1969, while "A" -24, a setting to music by Handel of texts selected from all of Zukofsky's books, came out in 1972. Now this little volume completes the work, which is less an epic than an intellectual autobiography. These are among the least accessible portions of "A," but we find in them many of the work's themes, notably the references to music and the interweavings of material from Shakespeare. There is also a fine retelling of the Gilgamesh story in "A"-23. Even without the testimony of Zukofsky's fellow-poets (from Ezra Pound to Cid Corman and Robert Kelly) it would be clear that "A" is the serious work of a disciplined talent. Exegetes will be laboring for years over these texts—a sign at once of their importance and of their obscurity and lack of relation with a general audience. Zukofsky is a poet's poet, and an academic's quarrying ground.—Seamus Cooney, Dept. of English, Western Michigan Univ., Kalamazoo

Campbell, John C., ed. Successful Negotiation: Trieste 1954; an appraisal by the five participants.
Princeton Univ. Pr. Feb. 1976. 176p. $11.50. INT. AFFAIRS

This work focuses on the successful settlement of the dispute between Italy and Yugoslavia over Trieste. The case study consists primarily of open interviews with the principal negotiators involved in the conclusion of this agreement, and its stated purpose is to generate hypotheses about the nature of the process of negotiation and mediation. In this regard, the editor contends that "together with the choice of techniques and their skillful use, it was the fact of a changing political context recognized as favorable when it finally became so, that provided the key to success." Campbell also suggests that the two-stage negotiations by third parties which were used in the Trieste situation could prove useful in the resolution of disputes such as those raised by the Middle East conflict. The generalizations are not particularly original or startling.

Cline, Ray S. World Power Assessment: a calculus of strategic drift.

pub. in coop. with the Center for Strategic & Internat. Studies, Georgetown Univ. by Westview Pr., 1898 Flatiron Ct., Boulder, Colo. 80301. 1975. 173p. index. LC 75-24129. ISBN 0-89158-011-5. $12.75. INT AFFAIRS

The stated purpose of this book is to evaluate the structure and evolution of the current international balance of power. Cline assesses power from a geopolitical perspective, with emphasis on geography, population, size, economic strength, military capability, strategic purpose, and national will. He argues that the world balance of power is drifting away from the U.S. and toward the Soviet Union and China, and that the U.S. "must offer credible security guarantee to a core group of allies in order to prevent totalitarian control of Eurasia." It may be pointed out that this statement simply does not flow from the author's static analysis of the international distribution of power. Moreover, even if Cline's quantification of economic, military and geographic power is persuasive enough, his operational definitions of the key concepts of "strategic purpose" and national will are rather elusive. However, Cline writes clearly, with a minimum of jargon. He brings together considerable data which is clearly presented in numerous diagrams and colorful maps. As such, his work will be a source for college students, as well as a useful reference tool in academic and specialized libraries.—Jacques Fomerand, Dept. of Political Science, Queens Coll., CUNY

Johnson, Haynes (text) & Frank Johnston (photogs.) The Working White House.

Washington Post Bk: Praeger. 1975. 185p. LC 75-3747. ISBN 0-275-22550-X. $9.95. PHOTOG/GOVT

This book concerns the inner workings of the White House from Adams to Ford, with emphasis on the latter. The book includes many of the same gossipy touches as J. B. West's Upstairs at the White House (LJ 8/73), and these serve to enliven an otherwise factual account of White "Housekeeping." The text dwells on mundane details providing few (if any) original facts about the history of the White House or the personalities of the occupants. Strictly a browsing book.—*Ruth E. This extensive study was designed to determine the effect of recent poverty programs on the political strength and power structure in poor communities. Interviews were conducted with residents, leaders (political and ideological), educators, PTA presidents, and poverty agency officials in one poor neighborhood in each of 100 communities. The survey results show that those neighborhoods accepting some form of militancy have had slightly more success in revitalization, but, in general, political growth has not been an achievement of the federally supported programs. The book offers clear discussions of the survey results as well as comparisons with other literature. The major problem with this report is that the research was conducted in 1968 and 1969, leaving open the question of what has transpired since. And although the survey covers distinctions among blacks, whites, and Chicanos, it excludes Puerto Ricans, who make up a large poverty group in the Northeast.—Kathryn Scarich, Nichols Memorial Lib., Trumbull, Conn.

Indiana Univ. Pr. 1975. 296p. illus. bibliog. index. LC 75-1939. ISBN 0-253-11725-9. $10. POL SCI

A professor of political science at the University of Illinois, Chicago Circle, and a person long active in Chicago politics, Rakove has written an analysis of the political machine which Daley developed and perfected for Chicago and surrounding Cook County. His thesis first of all is that local politics should satisfy the citizen's basic needs and then should provide power and money to the local politician. The degree to which the citizen and the politician can be satisfied represents the degree of success of the political machine. Rakove believes that the Daley Machine has performed admirably in both respects, but he views the future with uncertainty because of the changing ethnic make-up of the city population and of the suburban population. Rakove's well-organized narrative is interspersed with colorful political stories of the Daley machine, and it is relatively jargon-free despite a few examples of imprecise and cumbersome categories ("upper middle class Anglo-Saxon Protestant-oriented reformers"). Of more limited popular appeal than Mike Royko's Boss (LJ 6/1/71) and Len O'Connor's Clout (LJ 5/1/75) because the book is essentially a study of the machine developed by Daley and not about Daley himself.—*Jack Forman, Eastern Massachusetts Regional Lib. Rosenbaum, H. Jon & Peter C. Sederberg, eds. Vigilante Politics.

Univ. of Pennsylvania Pr. 1975. 250p. LC 75-11168. ISBN 0-8122-7694-9. $10. POL SCI

These 14 essays by noted social scientists examine the phenomenon of vigilantism from theoretical, American, and comparative perspectives. The various contributors generally agree that vigilante politics can be defined as extralegal action, often violent, usually designed to defend some status quo situation against chaotic threats. As with most scholarly collections, this one is uneven. Some of the essays are marred by excessive jargon and a tendency to belabor the obvious. By far the best essay is Richard Brown's overview of vigilante activity in American history, showing both continuity and change in vigilante activity. Despite its uneven treatment, Vigilante Politics will be of use to social science scholars, because the book does have a rather unique perspective.—Anthony O. Edmonds, Dept. of History, Ball State Univ., Muncie, Ind.

Valenti, Jack. A Very Human President.
Norton. Jan. 1976. 416p. photogs. ISBN 0-393-05552-3. $9.95. MEMOIR/POL SCI
Valenti, head of the White House Appointments Secretary office from 1963 to 1966, and long-time LBJ friend and confidante, has written an informal, anecdotal, approving review of the Johnson Presidency. The book's strength lies in Valenti's personal insight into the attitudes of White House aides glorying in delegated authority, and his recreation of the personal interactions underlying key events (the aftermath of the Kennedy assassination, the 1964 elections, the 1965 decision to commit American troops to Vietnam). It is worth noting that Valenti's emphasis on the intellectual and fact-finding aspects of Johnson's decision-making style differs from the assessments of other observers. The book's weaknesses include a lack of critical evaluation of events and a general failure to differentiate between events of historical importance and merely interesting anecdotes.—*Carol S. Wolanin, Thomas R. Presidential Advisory Commissions: Truman to Nixon.
Univ. of Wisconsin Pr. 1975. 298p. index. LC 74-27317. ISBN 0-299-06860-9. $17.50. POL SCI
Wolanin systematically analyzes the significance of recent Presidential advisory commissions, giving consideration to the various origins, purposes, make-ups, operations, and impacts of the commissions convened to deal with long-range problems (the 1951 President's Materials Policy Commission) and with immediate social crises (the 1967 National Advisory Commission on Civil Disorders). In general, Wolanin rejects the criticism that commissions are hotbeds of political futility and that they represent a major Presidential means of avoiding difficult decisions. He feels confident that they perform a vital job in familiarizing the public with national problems and outlining alternative lines of action. Yet he concedes that "the vigorous support of a sympathetic and strong President is the most valuable asset a commission can have." Wolanin's work is based on solid data, and it is the best available study of the mechanics of this modern political phenomenon.—Charles DeBenedetti, Dept. of History, Univ. of Toledo, Ohio

Becker, Ernest. Escape from Evil.
Free Pr. 1975. 182p. $9.95. REL/PSYCH
In this posthumously published sequel to Denial of Death Becker argues that the evil directed by humans against each other inevitably springs from the drive to surpass human limits, to reach for immortality, and thus to achieve a heroic stature transcending the threat of death. Against both Rousseau and Marx, Becker maintains that mankind never enjoyed a state of freedom and innocence from which it was brought to corruption by the forces of evil and oppressive social institutions. From the beginning, the individual is "already unfree, even before he gets to society"; he is in bondage to his own strivings toward immortality. In order to surpass the vulnerable contingencies of the human condition, to achieve an immortal self-image that witnesses to our absolute significance in the cosmic scheme of things, we will kill our neighbor, rob him, starve him, steal his legal rights. Becker presents a useful thesis in a brisk, informal style. As always, he is best when drawing on the works of Otto Rank. Though he interprets religion as just another ritualized effort to control human destiny, he nonetheless wittingly or unwittingly presents here a fresh interpretation of the theological doctrine of original sin: "The paradox is that evil comes from man's urge to heroic victory over evil."—Ann Belford Ulanov, Program in Psychiatry and Religion, Union Theological Seminary, New York

Fieve, Ronald R., M.D. Moodswing: the third revolution in psychiatry.
Morrow. 1975. 286p. illus. index. LC 75-15624. ISBN 0-688-02938-8. $8.95. PSYCH
As presented by Dr. Fieve, mania and depression are not terms reserved for deranged and institutionalized persons; they apply in some measure to a large segment of the general population, and such moodswings (as he calls them) are experienced by many successful and prominent individuals. Fieve cites Abraham Lincoln's serious depressions and the hypomanic states experienced by Theodore Roosevelt and Winston Churchill—states characterized by a wide range of ideas, need for little or no sleep, impulsivity, and moodiness. Fieve also gives examples of modern-day men who probably have fairly dramatic moodswings. The author strongly recommends the use of lithium carbonate as an agent which can calm agitated, manic patients and which can also prevent the recurrence of depressive disorders. However, he feels, American psychiatrists underdiagnose manic-depressive disorders as much as 86 percent of the time; thus misdiagnosis causes lithium to be underused. In general, Fieves' book is accurate, well written, and informative. While he may seem somewhat evangelistic regarding the potentials of lithium, the evidence (as verified both by those who have prescribed and used it) is on his side.—*Barbara J. common sense; some anguished parents may derive comfort from it. However, most will probably find the advice quite general, redundant, and overstated. Science & Behavior. 1975. 256p. LC 74-79081. ISBN 0-8314-0036-6. $7.95. PSYCH

Taking his title and chapter headings from 11 of the greater arcana of the tarot, a psychotherapist of Jungian and Gestalt persuasion relates insights and experiences gained during his work as a therapist in prisons, hospitals, and in private practice. He is not interested in offering counseling methodology; instead, he delights in little homilies and stories drawn from the Jewish mystic tradition. A warm humanism pervades his free-flowing, conversational approach, which seems aimed at evoking in the readers the kind of personal rapport brought about in an individual encounter or in group therapy. A likable, somewhat formless book, which succeeds in transmitting the effort and insight required to grow into a loving, aware human being.—Jack Tootell, Orange, Calif.

St. Martin's. Jan. 1976. 201p. illus. bibliog. ISBN 0-704-32061-4. $8.95. PSYCH

The five carefully and well written essays in this volume take issue with various explanations of aggression, specifically with the psychoanalytic theory of aggression as id expression, the frustration-aggression hypothesis, and the observations of ethology that seem to demonstrate that aggression is an instinct in all animals. In contradistinction, the authors maintain that aggression is learned behavior learned very early and reinforced throughout life by environmental factors such as world events, the media, nationalism, etc.—but definitely not a natural or inherent part of human behavior. They feel strongly that we must combat the notion that acts of competitiveness and aggression (whether committed by individuals or nations) are "normal" and socially useful. The book was first published in Germany in 1971. It deserves wide reading.—George Adelman, Neurosciences Research Program, M.I.T., Boston

Regnery. 1975. 160p. illus. LC 75-13213. ISBN 0-8092-8208-9. $7.95. OCCULTISM

Bergier argues that there are peculiarities in the earth surface that cause doors to other worlds to open. Where are these doors? Well, secret societies exist which preserve this knowledge and keep it from the rest of us. The author discusses what kind of knowledge these societies might have and how they initiate new members. The problem doesn't arise too often since the members of some of these societies are immortal, but one must be prepared. Bergier is long on conclusions and short on information. His book is quite entertaining and often presents intriguing speculations. It does require a credulous reader, however.—Robert Molyneux, Virginia Polytechnic Inst. & State Univ. Lib., Blacksburg

Harper. 1975. 207p. illus. index. LC 75-4270. ISBN 0-06-012152-1. $8.95.
ARCHAEOLOGY/OCCULTISM

The title is, in a way, a misnomer; the author deals with the construction of the great pyramids rather than with the sphinx. Ivimy draws some rather sophisticated mathematical parallels between the structure of the pyramids and the megalithic constructions of England, then relates the civilizations of ancient Egypt to the mythical Hyperboreans. He uses these correlations to advance a theory, (told in narrative form in Part 3 of the book) of a prior, more intelligent civilization whose advanced technology is responsible for the structures under consideration. These are admittedly speculative inferences and the historical data is occasionally strained to fit. An intriguing and well presented hypothesis though, for readers interested in early history, archaeology, and occult philosophy.—*Jo-Ann D. Bennett, John C. The Radical Imperative: from theology to social ethics.

Westminster. 1975. 225p. $7.95; pap. $3.95. REL

In light of the current world-wide problems of inflation, hunger, overpopulation and oppression, Bennett attempts to "reaffirm the Christian radical social imperative in the light of the present plight of humanity." This is, in essence, a seeking of justice and peace, a "reflection of the love of God for all people." Although Bennett sees the value of individual concern and action, he maintains that "grass roots" activity is not enough. The basic institutions of our society, the policies of our government must change to be more responsible. Using the biblical revelation of Christ as the primary example, and the experience of the Church as the secondary example for Christian ethics, he looks at the emerging "theologies" of liberation, revolution, and hope. In them, he sees a new concern in the church for challenge rather than comfort in the status quo. This is a solid work that aptly captures the current thought of Christian activists. It also reflects the changes in such traditional theological thought, as represented by Bennett himself.—Sharon S. Peterson, formerly with Anne Arundel County P.L., Annapolis, Md.

Ben-Sasson was the Jewish history editor for the Encyclopedia Judaica. Most of the essays in this book derive from his contributions to the EJ and concern the ways that Jews and Judaism have dealt with secularism in Europe from 313 to the 19th Century. His theme is that the problems facing Jews today (the dangers of assimilation, identity, and internal dispute) are no different from those they faced in medieval Germany, or in 17th-Century Poland, or in Visigothic Spain; only the circumstances and personalities have changed. The best chapter deals with Kiddush ha-Shem (i.e., the concept of dying for the glory of God and His people). The rest of the book largely fails to convey its ideas. Ben-Sasson has not made his original material more readable or coherent here. There are no footnotes and the bibliography is very abbreviated. For libraries lacking the EJ or anything else on the subject.—Daniel D. Stuhlman, Hebrew Union Coll. Lib., Cincinnati

This study is a happy blend of scholarly research and insightful interpretation. In Krishna, the god of love and beauty, and in Kali, the goddess of death and destruction, Kinsley finds, as it were, the incarnation of the dipolar nature of Hindu religious experience: the "other" dimension of reality is encountered as both intoxicating and terrifying, as both "fascinosum" and "tremendum" (R. Otto). And it is in surrender to the divine as both delightful and frightful that one attains liberation and redemption. Admitting that Kali is of relatively recent appearance in Hindu tradition, Kinsley argues that both deities embody central elements of Hinduism. Krishna expresses bhakti devotion as well as divine "lila" (playfulness) and "ananda" (bliss), while Kali illustrates the Hindu concepts of "maya" (illusion), "prakrti" (matter) and time as infinite and cyclical. The book is well structured and clearly written and would serve well as a supplemental resource in Eastern religions.—Paul Knitter, Dept. of Theology, Xavier Univ., Cincinnati MacGregor, Geddes. He Who Lets Us Be: a theology of love.

Crossroad: Seabury. 1975. 210p. ISBN 0-8164-1202-2. $8.95. REL

Proposing to take the biblical definition "God is love" (1 John 4, 8) seriously, MacGregor concludes to a concept of God which, he feels, "flies in the face" of tradition. A God of love is a God who in creation does not exercise absolute power but renounces it—a God who lets his creatures be and thus limits himself and enters into the change and suffering of the finite. An omnipotent, impassible God is a false God. MacGregor argues that the influence of Greek thought has kept theology from such a kenotic vision of divine creativity. With this vision he seeks to correct the inadequacies of traditional trinitarian doctrine and to shed new light on the questions of freedom, evil, providence, and prayer. The book is expressly indebted to the later writings of Simone Weil; but it is also in basic agreement with the "new theism" of process theologians and with much of Jürgen Moltmann's The Crucified God (LJ 9/15/74). With his "new vision" of God MacGregor stands in reputable company. Though not highly original, the book makes for a readable, stimulating addition to any theological library.—Paul Knitter, Dept. of Theology, Xavier Univ., Cincinnati

A companion volume to The First Days of Israel: In the Footsteps of Moses (LJ 11/15/73), this book continues the same coffee-table format: pages of glossy illustrations and minimal text. Some material from the previous volume has been included as an introduction to the story of the Hebrew people from the 11th to the 6th Century B.C.E. The illustrations include photographs of sites in modern Israel, archaeological discoveries, and art works—their appropriateness at times seems questionable. This book "brings to life many of the dry and often incomprehensible quantities that are encountered in textbooks." Short examples, illustrated with drawings and photographs, help the reader develop images of these quantities. Some examples of the book's subject matter follow: the world's population increases each year by an amount equal to the present population of Japan; if a human heart were an electric motor, it would cost $1.20 per year to run; if all the diamonds ever mined were collected, they would not fill a medium-sized room. The book is arranged topically, with a brief subject index. The figures, based on a limited spot check, are accurate. One minor error in definition was found in the section on noise pollution. I wish the author had used more extensive footnoting so that the sources used to convert the data could be easily referenced. The book is informative, enjoyable, and introduces a unique method for data presentation.—Richard J. Peppin, Science Applications, Inc., McLean, Va.

A representative selection of 77 of the most important papers out of a total of almost 250 written by Mulliken, who won the Nobel Prize in chemistry in 1966 for his work on chemical bonding and molecular orbitals. Included are general and historical papers, as well as sections on band spectra, polyatomics and valence, intensities of electronic spectral transitions, spectra and structure of polyatomics, hyperconjugation, and molecular orbitals. Each section is preceded by an introduction by Mulliken. The book contains a complete bibliography of Mulliken's articles and an appendix of visiting professors, postdoctoral fellows, and students who collaborated with Mulliken. The history of aeronautical failure is romanticized in these two volumes. Wood presents an authoritative account of numerous British aviation projects whose abandonment led to the decline of a prosperous aerospace industry. He traces this unprecedented decline (which included several jet and helicopter-type aircraft which failed to make it into production and resulted in staggering losses of capital, manpower, and world-wide prestige) from the end of World War II. He also probes the economic and political reasons for abandonment and discusses far-reaching repercussions.

Gilbert's romance with aeronautical failure is a tragicomedy. He presents in detail the colossal attempts to get aircraft monstrosities and design blunders off the ground, often with tragic results. Gilbert also renders an interesting account of the eccentric characters responsible for such aeronautical absurdities. These two works make for fascinating reading and are recommended for specialized aeronautical collections.—William A. McIntyre, Laconia State Sch. Lib., N.H.

Brann, Donald R. How To Build Pet Housing.

Directions Simplified. 1975. 178p. illus. LC 75-269. $5.95; pap. $2.50. PETS

The directions in this step-by-step guide to building pet cages and shelters are quite simple and easily followed. The author believes ambitious craftspeople can make money selling these portable models to pet owners. Thus, most of the designs are for cages for small animals, e.g., duck, rabbit, cat, hamster, and parakeet cages. The large stationary dog or cat kennel described is excellent, providing such details as sub-surface preparation for runoff and kennel sanitation. Most important, the author displays some expertise in building code pitfalls, animal needs, and cost reduction. Definitely useful in public libraries.—*Colleen Power, Arizona State Univ. Scribners. 1975. 91p. illus. LC 75-946. ISBN 0-684-14259-7. $8.95. RECREATION/ANIMAL HUSBANDRY

This book consists in its entirety of line drawings and short captions that tell the story of horse packing in a remarkably clear, concise, and delightful fashion. Everything about horse packing is included—selecting and training a packhorse, replacing a shoe, rope work and knot tying, packing game, loading the pack horse, making up the pack strings, riding the trail, camping, etc. The drawings are excellent, both from the standpoint of art and of clarity. This book should have large demand among horsemen, whether neophytes or pros, and among all those interested in nature, hunting, conservation, and the outdoors.—*Gaydell M. This book discusses such aspects of conformation showing as ring etiquette, gaiting, and posing. Although the text is lucid, providing some useful tips, and the photographs are good, much of the advice is commonsensical and rather obvious (e.g., wearing nonslippery shoes in the ring; keeping your dog in shade on hot, sunny days; controlling aggression in your dog). A less than necessary purchase.—Susan Matusak, Inst. for Sex Research Lib., Indiana Univ., Bloomington

Arco. 1975. 113p. illus. index. LC 73-92075. ISBN 0-668-03443-2. $7.95. ANIMAL HUSBANDRY

Although his advice is aimed at the trainer of the Western horse, much of what Jones has to say makes good sense for all horse trainers, both novice and expert. Beginning with some ideas on what to expect from a particular horse's breeding and conformation, he discusses basic gentling and preliminary training and goes into greater detail about advanced methods and special training. Jones illustrates many of his principles with examples from his own work as a seasoned Western trainer. Recommended for public libraries and horse trainers. The reputation of the author of this much-needed book as a knowledgeable student of cultivated ferns is sufficient to recommend the quality of its text. (I have not seen the illustrations.) That the manuscript was "looked over" by a number of outstanding pteridologists and that the author had the benefit of their counsel give further assurance of authenticity. There are discussions about the structure, collection, and cultural needs of ferns, including soils, fertilizers, planting, and propagation; attention is given to the use of ferns as landscape ornamentals and to the care of particular kinds; and troubles, including pests and diseases, are dealt with. The only really important fault I find with the work is that the descriptions of the individual species are much too ab-

This is an English book for gardeners in the British Isles. As such it is less completely useful to Americans than a text with wider coverage. Perhaps nowhere in the world can ornamental aquatics be grown more easily or to greater perfection than in the United States, and the sorts that succeed in summer outdoors include a wide range of gorgeous tropicals, some of which the author pays some attention to in his brief chapter "Plants for the Heated or Indoor Pools." Nevertheless, this offering contains a good deal of information that can be used, sometimes after a little adapting, by American gardeners. The plant descriptions are good. There is an admirable chapter on submerged plants for aquariums, others on bog gardens, fish, and constructing and maintaining pools. Recommended.—*Elizabeth C. This book, originally written for a British audience, details the problems that arise for families faced with a child suffering from chronic cystic fibrosis (CF). Burton, a specialist on behavior problems in childhood, has written other books on high-risk and dying children. In this work, she deals with the relationship between the children and their parents and discusses the symptoms and diagnosis of CF. Her main thrust is toward assisting parents, siblings, and the afflicted child to cope with the disease in the best possible way. The British orientation of this work and its scholarly tone, however, render it of interest only to specialists in the field rather than the general public.—*Beatrice J. Butler, Robert & Myrna Lewis. Sex After Sixty: a guide for men and women in their later years.
Harper. Feb. 1976. 192p. illus. bibliog. index. $6.95. HEALTH
In this useful contribution to the literature confronting prejudice against the aged in contemporary society, permission is given the person over 60 not only to appreciate and express his or her sexuality, but also to choose not to if that is really one's preference. Sexual activity is considered in the context of a total program for self-respect, self-expression, and physical well-being. Although emphasis is not placed on the "technology of sex," much practical information about techniques is included. Advice is offered on how to attain sexual pleasure alone, as well as on how to approach the challenge of finding a partner, and how to meet possible disapproval from family if one is found. Exercise, diet, and personal care are covered. Information is supplied on where and how to find advice and assistance on almost every topic that might concern an aging person. Much more concrete than Peter Dickinson's bombastic Fires of Autumn (LJ 11/1/74); more practical than Ivor Felstein's Sex and the Longer Life (LJ 7/72) or Isadore Rubin's Sexual Life after Sixty (Signet o.p.). Could be supplemented by Bernice and Morton Hunt's Prime Time (LJ 2/15/75) and H. H. Dial. 1975. 224p. illus. bibliog. index. LC 75-21878. ISBN 0-8037-5702-6. $7.95. HEALTH
Passwater, a biochemist with research interests in gerontology and cancer, presents the thesis that the average American is not well nourished, especially if he relies on the official "recommended daily allowances." Most of the book is devoted to illustrating this point. An appendix acts as a guide for readers wishing to locate information on a particular vitamin, and there is a good index. Passwater leans toward Pauling et al., but he does point out some of the problems in their (and other) programs. His own "super-nutrition" program, which each individual must work out for himself, is based on a series of self-tests and medical data which he spells out in detail. Readers are urged to have a physician monitor the program's progress. Passwater makes some strong claims for his program (e.g., "supernutrition will reduce the incidence of all diseases"), but on the whole this is a reasonably restrained and informative book that will be well used in public libraries.—*William K. explains how they came to be threatened, why we should care, and what is being done about the question of their survival. The animals are grouped by continent, and there are extra chapters on islands and oceans. Each animal's range and habitat are given, along with reasons for its decline and the estimated number presently surviving. Dial. 1975. 352p. color illus. bibliog. index. LC 74-23534. ISBN 0-8037-3110-8. $24.95. NAT HIST

Some cynics may argue that the only "great" thing about this pretentiously titled book is its price. However, it has a lot more going for it than many large, coffee-table books. The many color photos and paintings are quite fine; the author is a recognized authority; and the book has a valid plan. Several pages and illustrations are devoted to each of the world's bird families. The text is detailed yet readable, although touching on only a few interesting aspects of each bird family. The book is clearly intended for browsing rather than reference. The bibliography is inconsistent, incomplete, and not always up-to-date. Other books have covered the same ground, e.g., O.L. Austin's Familes of Birds (Golden: Western, 1961; 1971. new ed.); nevertheless, Gooders' work is recommended for larger public libraries that may need several titles on the subject.—*Henry T. Random. 1975. 130p. photogs. by Christopher Ayres. LC 75-10265. ISBN 0-394-49333-8. $8.95. NAT HIST

Here is a literate yet scientific account about a most adaptable animal group. Graham relates how gulls were once decimated for food and fashion, yet because of their ability to thrive by eating the wastes of man's affluent society, are now undergoing a population explosion. This readable monograph contains a skillful blend of scientific commentary and literary reference. It is a fascinating history, fulfilling admirably the promise of the subtitle. The 44 black-and-white photos document phenomena described in the text, which takes a realistic, no-nonsense look at a complex biological situation. Gulls should interest lay and scientific readers alike. Highly recommended for libraries with any sort of biological collection.—Henry T. Armistead, Thomas Jefferson Univ. Lib., Philadelphia

Taplinger. 1975. 230p. illus. by Richard Richardson. LC 75-904. ISBN 0-8008-8047-1. $10.95. NAT HIST

Although there are many excellent books on sea birds, few compare with this in its detailed study of their lives and behavioral patterns. From the courting of adults to the fledging of the year's young, Perry, a well-known British naturalist, records meticulous field research in the territorial assertion, nesting, and feeding activities of eight species of sea birds. Most important are his studies of the descent of the young into the sea. Some adjustment to terminology is necessary: the European quillemot is known as the common murre in North America, and few readers will be familiar with words such as bonxie, swaabie, or tystie. Because of its great detail, the book will be of most interest to bird watchers and ornithologists (who will, however, regret the lack of specific scientific names). There is neither an index nor a bibliography.—Joann Karges, Texas Christian Univ. Lib., Fort Worth

Schulberg, Budd. Swan Watch.
Delacorte. 1975. 151p. photogs., some color by Geraldine Brooks. LC 75-5761. ISBN 0-440-06016-8. $8.95. NAT HIST

Popular novelist Schulberg has written a simple account of a pair of swans, Loh and Grin, who make their home near the cottage owned by Schulberg and his wife Geraldine Brooks. Her photographs are excellent and complement the text. This is a story of getting acquainted and watching the course of mating and the raising of a family. It's also agonizing when the second hatching meets with disaster. Highly recommended for libraries where there is a call for well-written and well-illustrated natural history materials.—Barbara Barth, Southeast Arizona Regional Lib., Bisbee

Reston/a Prentice Hall. 1975. 415p. illus. index. LC 75-14286. ISBN 0-87909-150-9. $13.95. TECH

The book includes only stationary power tools, so the title is misleading. Drake covers setup of the workshop, power-tool care, procedures, and safety precautions. Tools discussed include the drill press, jointer, lathe, sander, shaper, thickness planer, and various types of saws (jigsaw, bandsaw, etc.). Parts, operation, accessories, calibration and maintenance, hints and kinks, and installation are described for each tool. An appendix features reference charts and a short glossary. The index is not as useful as it might have been—entries are primarily listed under type(s) of tool rather than independently, and there are some errors. Individual tools are forced into a structured, uniform treatment. R. J. DeCristoro's Complete Handbook of Power Tools: Both Stationary and Portable (Harper, 1973) is more comprehensive. However, Drake's book is aimed at the amateur and includes frequent "caution" items and step-by-step procedures. Recommended for high school and public libraries.—C. Jeffery Weber, Dallas P.L.

Contained herein are "facts . . . presented in plain non-technical language" for the "average concerned American." Doubleday. Jan. 1976. LC 75-18370. ISBN 0-385-03786-4. $7.95. SOC SCI
In these inflationary times, women who once felt forced by society to choose between motherhood and a career now choose both. Nevertheless, many mothers who return to work do so with grave misgivings. In this perceptive and persuasive book, Curtis skillfully debunks many of the myths which have kept mothers hovering over the cradle. After interviewing more than 200 mothers and reading numerous sources, Curtis concludes that children left with proper care at the proper time rarely suffer the emotional trauma professionals may warn working mothers to expect. The author's comments on ambition and the effects of working on the marital relationship are insightful. Her sensible advice on housework and child care will help many women cope more successfully with their demanding dual role.—Victoria K. Musmann, Glendale P.L., Calif.

TECH SOC SCI
A short survey of "King Oil" and its discovery, its growing importance, and its ultimate impact on American industry, government, and society. Stressing the "particular conjunction of oil and American destiny," Solberg offers something of a sociological commentary on American society, whose pattern of prosperity has been based traditionally on cheap energy sources. With regard to higher oil prices, Solberg concludes that the current choice is between an unpleasing dependency on foreign oil or the painful restructuring of the American economy. Other authors offer a more thorough analysis of the country's contemporary problems and options, but Solberg has produced an interesting and often entertaining summary of oil on the American scene. Well researched and interspersed with biographical profiles. And the bibliography is good. For general and undergraduate library collections.—*Joseph R. URBAN AFFAIRS
Based on selected proceedings of a major international conference (held in 1974 and cosponsored by the London Sunday Times and the United Nations Fund for Population Activities), this volume offers a very readable account of the global impact of the urbanization process. ENVIRONMENT
This collection of 109 papers prepared for the 1974 conference of the Environmental Design Research Association focuses on five themes: human ecology, limited resources and economic stability, human health and life change, permanent centralizing environments, and gentle nomadic environments. Twelve of the 20 research topics based on these themes form the structural outline of the collection. The "Childhood City" section, which deals with the interactions of children with their environments, may be particularly valuable for planners. In the section "Computers and Architecture" current approaches to complex environmental variables are described, including computer-simulation methods. On the whole, this collection tends toward the technical side, although much of it is readable for a lay audience. In spite of such shortcomings as two paging sequences for each volume (making access clumsy), no indexing, and a steep price tag, this set belongs in every planning and environmental library. —*John H. Praeger. 1975. 224p. illus. bibliog. index. LC 74-15689. ISBN 0-275-52910-X. $7.95.
ENVIRONMENT
This book is about thermal pollution, an environmental hazard which has been little discussed until recently. Modern civilization, with its cities and farms, factories and homes, and cars and air conditioners, is an increasingly prolific source of heat. The author believes that this massive heat output has begun to change Earth's climate, and that a continued increase in thermal pollution could eventually melt the polar ice cap. As a result, sea levels would rise, and the flooding would be disastrous for human civilization. To avoid this catastrophe, the author proposes direct conversion of solar energy to fuel, as a by-product of farming the oceans to feed mankind. Perhaps this brief statement of Wilcox's ideas makes them sound unlikely. Indeed, some of his conclusions are based upon debatable premises. However, the book is recommended, not as prophecy, but as an example of the kind of global ecological thinking that all of us must understand.—Raymond L. Hough, Dept. of Chemistry, Univ. of Michigan, Ann Arbor

The Little Victims

How America Treats Its Children

by HOWARD JAMES

"This lengthy book is extremely effective in presenting a grim story—that of physical and emotional abuse of American children and the often barbarian solutions we use for 'treatment' or 'institute hospitalization.' The author's involvement in his subject is evident—one can sense the pain he must have experienced while researching this book. Anecdotal experiences, institutional records, statistical data, and personal observation provide the reader with all the evidence he needs to conclude that in many areas of this country care for 'deviant' children is quite inhumane, and that many aspects of American culture and environment are pervasive forces in producing children that will be labeled by society as deviants. James argues persuasively and with substantiation. He also presents some individuals and programs that are models in intervention and caring about children."

The Yurok were the first California Indians with whom Kroeber worked. Published here, much of it for the first time, is the oral literature which explains and rationalizes that culture's ceremonies and practices. Lyric and evocative as much as narrative or descriptive, the stories elicit feelings such as pity, homesickness, desire for vengeance. And Kroeber provides biographical information about each storyteller. Since the myths themselves are closely related to particular locales, knowledge of Yurok geographical concepts, place names, etc. is especially important; and the volume includes an excellent selection of maps chosen from T. Here a seasoned insurance investigator takes the reader through that peculiar stretch of American greed where husbands murder wives and experienced hunters blow off their own limbs for money. You learn that it isn't wise to claim your boss has been murdered when there is still a Mafia contract out for his death, and how to conscientiously soil your neck brace so you can convince the investigator that you have worn it daily since the accident. But, in the end, the story turns into a study of character. While monopolizing a bull session with other hack investigators, "Joe" Healy—naive descendant of Quixote and James Bond—gradually emerges, in narratives that are often truly suspenseful, as a remarkable individual whose actions slowly come to manifest wisdom, compassion, and strength.—Charles Teixeira, New York

Univ. of Chicago Pr. (Studies in Crime & Justice). 1975. 254p. bibliog. index. LC 74-11629. $12.50. CORRECTIONS

Although gloom dominates most discussions of the juvenile justice system, two California projects—the California Treatment Project and the Probation Subsidy Program—frequently are touted on the grounds that they offer positive alternatives to institutionalization for delinquents. Lerman subjects the data from these projects to close scrutiny, and his analysis underscores the discrepancy between reality and intentions. For example, he shows that in one project the design called for a maximum of eight months of supervision for the juvenile; actually the average length of supervision time was two to three years. Using the criteria established by the projects, Lerman concludes that their effectiveness was no better than that of traditional methods while their social and fiscal costs were greater. A clear, iconoclastic look into these model programs.—Marge Kiersz, Pennsylvania State Lib., Harrisburg

Books about miscarriages of justice can be depressing, even frightening, but such exposures are necessary if we want to improve our system of justice.

Parker covers Chessman's crimes, the major figures in the case, his trials, errors and irregularities in procedure, and controversies surrounding the trial transcripts; he also gives a picture of the attitudes and mores of the times during the trials. Throughout, Parker is careful to identify his own opinions, including much corroborating evidence (such as other court decisions) to support his views.

Both An American Rape and Invitation to a Lynching deal with cases where the color of the defendants' skins contributed to the unjust conclusions of their cases. James V. Giles, coauthor of An American Rape, was one of the defendants in the case of three black youths who were convicted of raping a young white girl with a bad reputation who was then on probation in Montgomery County, Maryland, in 1961. Giles' subjective comments and reminiscences as well as quotations from his codefendants' letters (one of the others was his brother) add immediacy to the more objective presentations of facts and events by A. Robert

Smith. A well-done book. Invitation to a Lynching chronicles in sometimes dreary detail the history of the arrests, trials, convictions, and sentencings of two black men for the murders of two white gas station attendants in the Florida Panhandle in 1963. Gradually, the mass of information grinds the total waste of the defendants' lives and the seeming hopelessness of their situation into the reader's awareness.—*Marion Amdursky, formerly with Fairfax County Pub. As a member of the London City Police, Rumbelow has had access to the official police files on Jack the Ripper which will not be opened to the public until 1992. The book opens with a description of the poverty of London's East End at the turn of the century, a recreation which helps the reader understand why the Ripper proved so successful in eluding the police. Then, in minute detail which may well prove too gory for the squeamish reader, Rumbelow vividly describes the victims and how they were murdered, and offers ten candidates for the dubious honor of being Jack the Ripper. In a final chapter he discusses 20th-Century practitioners of the Ripper's art. Of particular interest is Peter Kürten, the Düsseldorf Ripper. Since many of Kürten's victims lived to tell their tales, the reader gains insight into the psychology of those tempted to tarry with a stranger in a city gripped by terror.—*David A. Viking. 1975. 398p. illus. index. LC 73-16935. ISBN 0-670-58209-3. $19.95. CULTURAL STUDY

Scully discusses Pueblo architecture and religious dance as manifestations of pervasive cultural value. His book is permeated with love and respect for Pueblo life, and it is a beautiful object in itself. But it suffers from an attempt to explain too much with too little. The buildings and ceremony can be made to "say" many things about the culture, but that "saying" is distorted unless it is grounded in intimate and specific knowledge of the economic, historic, geographic, and social forces that help to shape all of Pueblo life. Nevertheless, this rich and evocative work deserves our close attention in spite of its flaws.—Judith McPheron, Oklahoma County Libs.

Both of these books are similar in concept; both are limited in appeal; both play to the public's supposed interest in sports trivia. Of the two, Sports Quiz Book should be attractive to a wider audience. It provides brief background summaries of many sports, from baseball to bobsledding, from basketball to badminton. Also included are hundreds of questions apparently designed to tease the casual or devoted sports buff. Although innocuous enough, the book hardly is of substantive value. Coauthor Fischler is a talented writer; more could have been expected of him.

The Football Quiz Book is more provincial. Pro football addicts may adore the work; most other sports devotees will be bored. Trivia runs rampant. Both books are relatively inexpensive, but neither is worth the price.—Curt Smith, Assistant Director of Public Relations, Hamilton Coll., Clinton, N.Y.

doing the writing and editing from Ali's tape recording. It is an uneven blend of fact and feeling containing, as well may be imagined, few surprises. Although there is more honesty in the first person portrayal, much of it (as in the sexual exploits) seems gratuitous and forced. Ironically, the best and "newest" parts of the book deal with the champ's period of exile; his court battles far outstrip, in excitement, the action in the ring.

Far better written is the illustrated biography by Atyeo and Dennis. It has, in addition, superb photos. The 112 pages are double-spaced, with small type. The authors have done a great deal of research. They treat his religious conversion as thoroughly as they do his superb ring skills. Ali emerges as a man made up of many forces—pride, courage, religion, showmanship. The photographs are all familiar; but they are well presented to illustrate the text. It may be sacrilege to prefer the secondary source to the primary, but, for this reviewer's money, it is the better book.

Superfists is a profusely illustrated catalog of the world heavyweight champions from John L. Sullivan to Ali. Houston is editor of Boxing News and has his facts and records straight. The biographies of the boxers are supplemented by 20 pages of statistics. Not so strangely, it is Ali who dominates the book; as always, he has the final word. But even the low price cannot justify the purchase of such a low quality volume. The author is a first degree black belt, not considered instructor rank in Japan, who writes in a confusing and wordy manner. The photos corresponding to the descriptions are sometimes four pages away. In this reviewer's copy the print varies from dark to light (so light as to be unreadable), and some of the photos show through the pages and make reading difficult and disconcerting.—*Harold L. Model airplanes fall into two general categories: scale models of prototype airplanes (these can be impressive looking, but they tend not to be efficient flying models) and high-performance models (built exclusively with performance in mind, these bear only a general resemblance to full-sized aircraft). This British book is an entertaining nontechnical introduction to the world of high-performance model flying. It is not a how-to book, but rather a detailed description of the evolution of flying models, the numerous types of models built, and the elaborate range of competitions sponsored by the Fédération Aéronautique Internationale and other organizations. A selection of about 80 games, puzzles, and amusements form the basis of this work. They range from jump rope to chess, from cat's cradles (string puzzles) to roulette. Although the book treats several (mostly outdoor) games not found in the Diagram Group's The Way To Play (LJ 11/15/75), it is not as comprehensive or as broadly conceived. Nevertheless, it is a special book because of the historical notes on the games and the hundreds of brilliant, glossy color photos and art reproductions. There are do-it-yourself instructions for making each game, but unfortunately, many seem to require the services of a master carpenter. An elaborate table of contents and a brief bibliography are included. Over half the book relates to the title, describing strategies and ploys to psych out your opponents. Lardner did this before and did it better in The Underhanded Serve (LJ 10/1/68). The rest of the book describes imaginative matches played by and great shots hit by the author, describes how the various professions would indicate a ball was out (e.g., "Actor 'Out! Out! See the damned spot?' "), and parodies Jack Stahr's Decisions column in World Tennis magazine (also done before in The Underhanded Serve). Schickel, best known as a film critic and TV producer, has written a book that might be called a thinking devotee's account of the game. You won't turn to him for definitive history but for perceptive comments on those aspects of that history he has chosen to emphasize, e.g., the importance of Tilden, Lenglen, and King to the game; the reasons why so many of us identify with and root for Ken Rosewall; the discussion of the Hopman era in Australia. Numerous well-chosen illustrations add to the value of the book. It should have been published sooner; Schickel's comments on tennis in New York's Central Park are dated and his account of Forest Hills 1974 suffers from being issued after Forest Hills 1975 when the whole aspect of that tournament changed. Even so I recommend this one.—David Peele, Staten Island Community Coll. Lib., New York

Erdman belonged to the generation of Soviet satirists that emerged after the Revolution. Judging from The Mandate (first produced in 1925) and The Suicide (written in 1928, withdrawn from theatrical consideration for political reasons, and never published in the U.S.S.R.), he was probably one of the most talented Russian playwrights. His comedies continue the great tradition of Gogol. In addition to sociopolitical satire (with many topical political jokes ridiculing the petty bourgeois and the new Soviet system), the plays raise questions about the fate of little men and their despairing sense of alienation and insignificance. The plays' comic situations, as well as their themes, have remained timely and they undoubtedly deserve revival. Highly recommended for academic libraries.—*Jitka Hurych, Northern Illinois Univ. ea. vol: Random. Jan. 1976. LIT/THEATER

These two books are collections of Simon's previously published theater criticism. Uneasy Stages, devoted to specific critiques, stands on its own as a provocative, if cranky, portrait of the on- and off-Broadway stage of the last decade; but Singularities, devoted to more general critical writings, is a patchwork job of loose odds and ends, many of them slightly shopworn. Still, for anyone interested in theater or in coming to terms with America's most controversial critic, these two books are required reading.

Simon seems to see himself as the sole voice of reason in a critical world overrun with fads, commercialism, vainglory, and ignorance. His assumption may be right, but the tone of superiority is oppressive at times, even for those who admire his high standards. Simon possesses a cultivated taste which he defends with clarity and persuasion. His prose, however, is heavy and his articles often lack balance and proportion. Occasionally he becomes bogged down in petty detail; sometimes he goes after a butterfly with a hatchet. Even when he attacks a deserving opponent, his refusal to present a detached examination of what is being attempted nearly disqualifies the validity of his overall argument. At such times, Simon courts comparison with George Jean Nathan at his worst. Fortunately there is another side to Simon. At his very best he is judicious, insightful, illuminating, and worthy of comparison with Stark Young, Eric Bentley, and the pre-Yale Robert Brustein, the best American theater critics of the past.—Gary Carey, Dept. of Film & Theater History, Sch. of Visual Arts, New York

All the splendor and glory of royal India comes vividly to life in this lavishly illustrated volume. Hundreds of rare and classic photographs have been used to document the dazzling life in the courts of the maharajahs from the end of the 19th Century to the end of the 1920's. From culture-shocked Europeans to the ubiquitous nautch girls, the social milieu is re-created by eyewitness accounts and excerpts from private diaries of the period. For those curious enough to wonder whatever became of the maharajahs, an ample part of the book is given over to interviews with the heirs and descendants of these former rulers. The book's title is derived in part from the television screenplay of the same name which is herein printed in its entirety. This book will appeal to more than just film buffs. Leach limits his consideration of pornography to the movies. He calls pornography a "frontier phenomenon," by which he means it encompasses material considered out of bounds by a specific culture at a specific time. Right now Americans will readily censor sex while tolerating endless violence. Sex has gotten so explicit in movies, has crossed so many frontiers, in other words, that Leach foresees the end of erotic obscenity. He further predicts that gratuitous violence in movies will soon cause as much controversy as sex has, but he fails to provide enough evidence to convince me that this isn't just wishful thinking. Though Leach makes it clear that he finds mindless violence far more obscene than any tasteless sexual scene, he never advocates censorship, which he feels is unnecessary anyway because as we cross more frontiers our attitudes change. He sees our attitudes toward sex becoming less repressive, for example, though he does not explain why then we are still so willing to censor sex in movies. The book can be read quickly because of its conversational style and because it contains nothing very profound.—Carol W. Gelderman, Dept. of English, Univ. of New Orleans

Leiser, Erwin. Nazi Cinema.

Macmillan. 1975. 179p. tr. from German by Gertrud Mander & David Wilson. photogs. filmography. bibliog. index. LC 75-17603. ISBN 0-02-570230-0. $7.95. HIST/CINEMA Intended as a supplement to Leiser's documentary film on the Nazi propaganda machine in films from 1933 to 1945, this book presents a straightforward analysis of the thematic characteristics of virtually all the major German feature films of the period and of "the mechanics by which film became part of the propaganda machine." Thus, the author explains his own decision to remain as free from value judgement and explicit commentary as possible. There might be some disappointment for those seeking specifics about the actual film devices contributing to successful propaganda movie making; but as a history of the Hitler-Goebbels machine itself, Nazi Cinema serves a documentary-type purpose by listing and describing many films previously repressed and/or unknown to most of us, as well as some fairly chilling written documentation by Third Reich officials. Recommended for all film collections, and as good history.—Donald McCormick, N.Y.P.L.

Linder, Carl. Filmmaking: a practical guide.

Prentice-Hall. Jan. 1976. 300p. bibliog. ISBN 0-13-314807-6. $9.95; pap. Spectrum. ISBN 0-13-314799-1. $5.95. CINEMA

Linder provides material that will be of value to amateur film makers and offers insights into the film work of others in the field. He covers editing, lenses, lighting, planning and organization, documentaries, fictional narrative, collage, montage, experimental films, and special skills needed. The experimental material is especially welcome since it is most often given short shrift in film-making books. A bibliography of articles from Filmmakers Newsletter, a selected book list, and a glossary of terms (many of which are not found in other such glossaries) are included. Filmmaking is chatty without talking down to the reader, and it might serve as an auxilliary text in film-making classes in both high school and university situations.—*James L. Acland, Alice. The Secret Wife.

St. Martin's. Mar. 1976. 204p. $7.95. F

Madame de Maintenon, secret wife of Louis XIV, appears, perhaps surprisingly, as a character more admirable than passionate. As a consequence, the first-person narrative is moderately interesting without being thoroughly absorbing. The portrayal of this tremendously influential woman and her illustrious circle lacks the psychological depth which would make it a notable addition to collections of historical fiction. It should offend no one but will not linger in memory. Consider this brief and pleasant book only if this type of leisure reading material is in heavy demand.—*Karen Horny, Northwestern Univ. ea. vol.: Fiction Collective, dist. by Braziller. 1975. $8.95; pap. $3.95. F

These three books reflect the contemporary writer's struggle with the claims of objective reality versus the structures opposed to it by the narrative imagination.

Bumpus' stories tread the vaporous line between delusory violence and sexuality, and the nightmarish things that are starting to happen in unsuspecting Middle America. His character-victims include a bewildered revolutionaries' moll, a boxing kangaroo who turns on her doting trainer, and a traumatized cycle freak savagely mutilated by his gang. The writing is very fine, precise, and lapidary; very often, wasted on some overgarish, scarcely credible subjects.

Mimi Albert's dreamy sketch shows how two women romanticize a vicious antisocial belligerent into an heroic "natural genius." They all nestle together in sex and sexual fantasy, and in their chic, jaded rejection of conventionality. The "plot" is a string of lifeless clichés: this novel is a vapid originating idea; there's nothing here to be developed.

Clarence Major's novel is very much better: a wry, funky recording of the interconnections between writers and what they create. Black "actress" Cora Hull, her two lovers, and the author mix together in a backward-forward sequence of stopped paragraphs that obeys the dictates of writers' imperatives ("This novel has to keep changing.... Fiction is a stained glass window"). His people's activities intersect with Major's fears of the ends toward which he's shaping their destinies ("Murder scares the shit out of me"). This is truly the fiction of open-ended possibility, grounded in powerful ambiguities. Is Cora the author's real woman, imaginatively projected into "testing" fantasies?—or a purely literary creation, which ensnares his mind and feelings? And: does the novel end in violent wreckage because art demands finalities, obliging the fictionist "to deal with the situations and scenes"? The questions are unanswerable; the truthfulness of the experience is unquestionable. Major's is one of two first-rate books produced this year by the Fiction Collective (the other: Ronald Sukenick's 98°6). Not a bad year. —Bruce Allen, Kittery, Me.

Brashler, William. City Dogs.
Harper. Jan. 1976. 288p. ISBN 0-06-010448-1. $8.95. F

Harry Lum, a one-time thief and Cubs-loving wino, falls in with two hateful criminals in a plan to rob a dental supply house of its gold. Despite careful preparations, the robbers have seriously miscalculated—a brick wall separates them from their treasure. Harry is delegated to ram the wall repeatedly with a van. The police come. Two men escape, one shot. Harry is arrested. The wounded man is hunted down in the bowels of Chicago's subways. Harry's stepsister bails him out but evicts him from her building. Walking the streets, Harry is shot in the shoulder by the third robber. Any resident of old Polish neighborhoods in Chicago will recognize here an authentic portrayal of real inhabitants and their miseries. The telling, devastating detail is never omitted. Brashler's ear for conversation is acute, even down to the use of untranslatable Polish curses. He exerts severe control over his explosive material. Frequently, the violence threatens to boil over, making the reader dread to turn the page. Yet, these same horrid characters become almost likable when Brashler describes their quiet longings. After all, predators can be victims too.—Barbara Conoty, Madison P.L., Wis.

Cardiff, Sara. The Speaking Stones.
Coward. Jan. 1976. 225p. ISBN 0-698-10701-2. $7.95. F

Danielle Roberts, a young opera singer, marries genius-composer Stefan Brandt, a robust, vital man three times her age. Despite a stern German housekeeper and a perverted male secretary, their happiness seems assured because of Danielle's pregnancy. Then Danielle learns of the murder of two pregnant women in the area several years earlier, and when the pattern seems suddenly to be repeating itself, she becomes fearful. Despite some incompletely drawn and rather stereotyped characters, the plot moves along nicely.—Barbara Parker, Little Rock P.L.

Clews, Roy. The Valiant and the Damned.
Dutton. Jan. 1976. 185p. ISBN 0-525-22775-X. $8.95. F

This perfectly awful historical novel isn't even in the "enjoyable junk" category. Neither the endless succession of bloody massacres and maimings nor the cliché-ridden sexual encounters stir the reader from his stupor as he plods through its pages. Clews is an embarrasingly inept writer. His hero's "lips yearn" for a wealthy young heroine who is clearly supposed to be captivating, but comes across as annoyingly affected. Set in Redditch, England, in 1812, the book is supposed to deal with the Luddite labor movement's conflict with exploitative factory management, but this theme takes a back seat, and the insipid love story assumes the forefront—almost as if the author anticipated his readers' interest would start to wane early. He's right, but nothing he does is of help.—Joyce Smothers, Monmouth County Lib. System, Freehold, N.J.

Cooke, Judy. New Road.
St. Martin's. 1975. 191p. LC 75-9473. $7.95. F

This is a brief, pleasant tale of the efforts made by residents of a London street to save their row of Georgian houses from "redevelopment." Although style shows the influence of cinema and television, the author avoids insipidity of genre characterization and trite plot, and shows an alertness for amusing details. Her characters are credible and interact with vitality. A number of English slang expressions may mystify some readers, but their use is not disruptive in an essentially smoothly written novel.—Merry S. White, Salt Lake City, Utah

Daniels, Dorothy. Whistle in the Wind.
Welles, Elisabeth. Fahnsworth Manor.
ea. vol: Pocket Bks: S. & S., dist. by Pocket Bks-Ace. Jan. 1976. pap. $1.25. F

After a clumsy beginning, Whistle in the Wind takes off with a nifty gimmick and a fairly intelligent heroine. Carolyn is called from her New Orleans debut in 1885 to go to her dying father. She and her mother arrive at the river plantation to find a 14-year-old curse decimating the population. The curse involves a riverboat fire and is too tricky to describe here. The flighty heroine becomes responsible overnight and solves the mystery.

Fahnsworth Manor is a neat modern Gothic with an independent heroine who chooses to remain that way, passing up one of the better heroes in recent novels. Its the usual Irish manor house being purchased by a rich American writer who has fallen in love with the house, not knowing about the ghost. While the basic ingredients are the same, the execution is well above average.—Phyllis Gallo, Way P.L., Perrysburg, Ohio

Dyer, Brian (pseud.). Without Regrets.
Mason/Charter. 1975. 195p. LC 75-14274. ISBN 0-88405-115-3. $7.95. F

Harington, Donald. The Architecture of the Arkansas Ozarks.
Little. 1975. 376p. illus. by the author. LC 75-16492. ISBN 0-316-34641-1. $9.95. F

The Ingledew brothers were the first to settle in Stay More in the Ozarks. They built the first cabin. As the years passed and the outside world intruded as best it could, more families came and more buildings were erected. A way of life emerged that encouraged eccentricity and yet provided close relationships among family members and among all the citizens of the community. Traditions and individuality were nurtured from generation to generation, but times were changing even in Stay More. During the Civil War brother literally fought against brother in this part of the Ozarks, and more legends were made. What was instinctively known to nearly every inhabitant was that the land and the dwellings molded a person more than a person could or should shape the land. And what a magnificent cast of characters inhabits this land. Their encounters with religion, politics, education, and sex are richly laced with humor, warmth, and common sense. Harington has succeeded in creating a fine novel. It is myth; it is tall tale; it is bawdy story; it is Americana; it is literature.—Robert H. Donahugh, Youngstown P.L.

Harper. Apr. 1976. 181p. ISBN 0-06-012197-1. $7.95. F

Ruth Jhabvala is probably the best Anglo-Indian novelist writing today. Her novels are superficially about Westerners in abrasive interaction with a hostile Indian environment; more basically they are, as are all good novels, examinations of human nature. Jhabvala uses India as a catalyst, as an outrageous force that elicits unexpected, frequently frightening, reactions from its visitors. Heat and Dust is the parallel story of the contemporary narrator, who is seeking an alternative to Western materialism, and of Olivia, her grandfather's disreputable first wife who ran away with the local nawab. The two story lines are not equally compelling; the older one has a great deal more interest. But that perhaps is the intention. The novel is wider in focus and more ambitious in its aims than is usual with Jhabvala. Thematically, this works very well. But it also emphasizes her chief narrative difficulty—that of knitting together short, closed scenes. Nevertheless, this is a very good novel.—Shernaz Mehta Mollinger, Dept. of English, Columbia Univ.

Lindquist, Donald. A Moment's Surrender.
Holt. Mar. 1976. 238p. $7.95. F

The plot of this mediocre novel, riddled with too-neat coincidences, concerns the pilgrimage of a young American soldier to the town in northeastern France where his father supposedly died in World War II. He falls for the most beautiful girl in town, only to discover that his lover is his half-sister and that their mutual father is alive and well. The author relies heavily upon the dramatic situation rather than on his own narrative skill to sustain reader interest and fumbles further by making events as predictable as possible. I've read more dreadful books, but none that I'll forget as soon as this one.—Joyce W. Smothers, Monmouth County Lib., Freehold, N.J.

Raymond, Ernest. The City and the Dream.
Saturday Review Pr.: Dutton. 1975. 288p. LC 75-6810. ISBN 0-8415-0384-2. $8.95. F

The story centers around the dream of a clerk in a Fleet Street newspaper office to achieve success as a novelist. His initial failure, his attempts to make a new life for a sister recently released from prison, and his romance with a young woman living in a nearby tenement are threads in this sentimental little love story. Old-fashioned by today's standards, the novel is enlivened by Raymond's skillful drawing of a host of Dickensian characters and his vivid descriptions of the London suburb which is the book's locale. Pleasant, if somewhat dated, reading. (Originally published in England in 1958.)—Agnes C. Ringer, formerly at Free Lib. of Philadelphia

Torres, Edwin. Carlito's Way.
Saturday Review Pr: Dutton. Jan. 1976. 179p. LC 75-14349. ISBN 0-8415-0408-3. $7.95. F

The tough, slangy, first-person story of some 30 years in the life of Carlito Brigante, a New York City-born Puerto Rican who fights and hustles his way from the streets and petty crimes to the numbers racket, murder, and dope peddling with mob members, apparently culminating, at novel's end, in a long jail stretch. There's a worrisome lack of morality: Brigante rationalizes away his part in the destruction of his fellow man as necessary to his own survival. The portrayal of the tone and fast pace of his life, while disheartening, nevertheless seems utterly authentic. A hefty glossary helps with much of the jargon, but be prepared to roll with the verbal punches and societal implications.—Thomas D. Bedell, Asst. Editor, "Valley Stream MAILeader," N.Y.

Van-Loon, Antonia. For Us the Living.
St. Martin's. Feb. 1976. 450p. $8.95. F

Beth Shepherd, young, voluptuous, and independent, is a teacher in New York City at the time of the Civil War. After an unfortunate love affair she goes to live with relatives in Pennsylvania and serves as a nurse in a field hospital during the Battle of Gettysburg. There she meets Major Kent Wilson, profane, sarcastic, but a highly skilled surgeon (one is reminded of Hawkeye in Mash). Eventually, they have a stormy but happy marriage. The novel is carefully researched, and it skillfully and convincingly pictures a romantic and sentimental era. The dialogue is not particularly inspired, but Van-Loon is a competent writer and her novel holds one's interest.—Albert Hausmann, Wallinford P.L., Conn.

Wambaugh, Joseph. The Choirboys.
Delacorte. 1975. 347p. LC 75-17969. ISBN 0-440-05363-3. $8.95. F

None of the sarcastic and scrofulous expletives have been deleted from Wambaugh's latest unveiling of the Hobbesian world inhabited by his "blue knights." In toto, they fill many pages of this novel as the daily, unceasing badinage of the "choirboys," ten members of the Los Angeles Police Department on night-watch. Their choir practice consists of regularly held orgiastic meetings in a local park—late at night, after work, in an effort to rid themselves of the retching brought on by their life and street experiences. The meetings, which finally come to disastrous end, form a backdrop to the happenings in the city and within the department itself. Wambaugh's prose is irrepressible. Each of the chapters crashes upon the reader until he is dangerously ready to believe that a world so thoroughly and irretrievably evil actually exists.—Aaron L. Fessler, Merrick, N.Y.

Billy is now a PR man for an industrial English town; he is 15 years older, but not noticeably wiser. THE AUCTIONEER
by JOAN SAMSON

Samson has written a powerful, unsettling allegory. The setting of this novel is a small rural town in New Hampshire. The main theme is developed through the juxtaposition of two characters: John Moore (a poor farmer of an old New Hampshire family) and Perly Dunsmore (a newcomer to town and the auctioneer of the title). For various complex reasons Moore and all the other townspeople give all their possessions to Perly Dunsmore to auction off. Moore does not protest Dunsmore's almost total control. He is afraid he may lose everything. But by not protesting he does lose everything. The violent ending is frighteningly satisfying." —Library Journal

Wilk, Max. The Kissinger Noodles . . . or Westward, Mr. Ho.
Norton. Jan. 1976. 232p. LC 75-17968. ISBN 0-393-08728-X. $7.95. F
An amiable bit of fluff that moves along at a lively clip and has all the ingredients of a madcap movie. Wilk has cranked up a thoroughly preposterous tale about a couple of silly billies named Camino who open a Chinese restaurant—the Mandarin Pleasure Garden—in Paramus, New Jersey and who find themselves desperately in need of a master chef. As it turns out a master chef by the name of Ho, who had delighted the palate of Henry Kissinger with an 18-course feast at a banquet in Peking, has been invited to Washington to share the wonders of his work with various notables in high government places. The Camino brothers kidnap Ho—and the fun begins. There is a great deal of scurrying about and a lot of hoopla as an assortment of picaresque types, including some CIA agents, try to recover the mystified Ho.—*A. J. This is another turbulent family saga by the author of Haversham Legacy (LJ 9/1/74), this time set in the Spanish Southwest during the late 1800's. The Martinez family had lived peacefully in the valley of the Tres Rios for more than 100 years until a secret gold deposit was discovered by gringo Leigh Ransome. By the use of unspeakably cruel devices, including vicious attack dogs, Leigh gains control of the valley (and marries into the Martinez family). Only when the Penitentes, a religious brotherhood, take things into their own hands does the growth of evil stop. A forceful and colorful story for fans of this genre.—*Barbara J. Yglesias, Helen. Family Feeling.
Dial. Feb. 1976. 352p. ISBN 0-8037-5365-9. $8.95. I
In the same illogical and disjointed way that most of us remember our pasts, Anne Goddard relates the story of some of her life. With dizzying speed, the author switches tenses and persons, as a place or a word touches off yet another stream of memories. The youngest of seven siblings who seem to hate each other, yet can't live without each other, Anne recalls her Jewish immigrant parents (whose funerals open the novel) and the endless competition among the children to be the favorite. As adults, all except Anne sponge off the generosity of millionaire brother Barry, despising him and themselves for it. Anne publishes volumes of literary criticism, marries money, and lives happily almost ever after. Yglesias writes like many people think, in convoluted paths that cause the reader to pause and come up for air now and then, but her characters become all the more human because of it.—*Marcia R. Chicago and its environs, as pictured in this collection of nine stories, present a bleak prospect indeed. The title story concerns the breakup of a banal marriage of a self-made man and a self-destructive woman, and appears to focus on the pointlessness of revenge. Characters in all of the stories drink a good deal, "philosophize" endlessly, and torment one another with acts of petty sadism. Zacharias has little of particular note to offer as an observer of human character or as a prose stylist: much of this material has the ring of Sinclair Lewis and Sherwood Anderson, though it lacks the hard-edged humor of the masters.—Rowe Portis, New York

Clarke, Arthur C. Imperial Earth.
Harcourt. Jan. 1976. 324p. ISBN 0-15-144233-9. $7.95. F
It is the 23rd Century and a number of colonies exist on various planets and moons. Spaceships need hydrogen which comes from Titan, one of the moons of Saturn. Ducan Makenzie, scion of the ruling family of Titan, visits the Earth for the 500th anniversary of the United States. There is little plot, which only acts as a frame for Clarke to hang his observations on. No one is complaining, though—Clarke is certainly a very fine writer of science fiction. When he puts his mind to it he can make the language do wonderful things. It is disconcerting to see Clarke casually throw out ideas that would keep other authors busy for a long time, but this is an intriguing, thought-provoking book.—*Robert Molyneux, Virginia Polytechnic Inst. & State Univ. Lupoff, Richard. The Triune Man.
Berkley, dist. by Putnam. 1975. 230p. $6.95. F
The protagonist is in a ward for the violent; he has three distinct personalities: creator of a popular comic strip, militant right-wing agitator, engineer. He is also at the center of the galaxy, where he has been brought by aliens to prevent the destruction of the universe. Alternating scenes relate his attempt to grasp his galactic mission (which may be another delusion), the maneuvering of his news syndicate to steal his strip, the realistic grimness of his childhood in Nazi Europe, and the bizarre melodrama of his fantasy hero's adventures. These draw together to ultimately show who he really is, what molded him, and how he must save himself (and the universe?). The beginning is slow and deliberately confusing but readers who persevere will be rewarded.—Frederick Patten, Los Angeles Science Fantasy Soc.

Jahna Swiss, of the Planet Peace Service Cadet Corps, accepts her assignment to the grim world of Nelding where her job has been described as caretaker for genetically mutant children. She is totally unaware of the complex and dangerous situation on this distant planet—mutation runs rampant and three disparate cultures struggle for an existence in a hostile environment. Forced to become a goddess to "savages" and "mother" to their children, Jahna struggles against evil forces and moral dilemma. Should she return home or can she accept the responsibility for molding future generations of Nelding inhabitants and the survival of their humanity? The author has written a compelling tale, vivid in its portrayal of a totally alien world. Williamson, Jack. The Power of Blackness.
Berkley, dist. by Putnam. Jan. 1976. 100p. ISBN 0-399-11467-X. $6.95. I
All the ingredients of old-fashioned, action-packed SF are here, including a final episode which is so sexist that I hesitate in my otherwise enthusiastic recommendation. The story consists of several episodes that star a black hero from a planet whose inhabitants are descendants of early space travelers and who have remained technologically undeveloped because of the harsh conditions of the planet. The black inhabitants are thus exploited by a variety of otherworlders. The social and technological implications of the story are handled well; not so, the love interest. The hero's partner and lover outranks him in the service in which they are employed. In a situation in which she is in charge, he must follow her orders against his own judgment. Naturally she makes a mess of things, and only his male aggression saves the day. As the book closes they are planning for their first child—a boy, naturally.—Lynn Fell, Milwaukee P.L. System mystery ... detective ...suspense...

Saving the Queen (Doubleday. Jan. 1976. LC 75-17405. ISBN 0-385-03800-3. $7.95) by William F. BUCKLEY is an oddly, unexpectedly, endearingly amateurish novel, an extended fantasy in which a young American, well off and of good family, is recruited to work for the CIA at the end of World War II. After training in Washington, he is posted to London to investigate the leakage of atomic secrets to the Soviet Union. These leaks are traced to the eccentric but popular Queen of England, whose lover in time he becomes. The style is curiously less mandarin than ladylike, with occasional fancy touches. The book is nonetheless cheerful, and Buckley clearly had a splendid time writing it.

Nicholas FREELING's The Bugles Blowing (Harper. Feb. 1976. LC 75-6366. ISBN 0-06-011354-5. $6.95) is the second of a new series and this lot is just as French as the previous one was Dutch. A senior civil servant has confessed to being guilty of the murder of his wife, his daughter, and the lover of both, the three having been caught with their pants down, so to speak. The action, which follows the form of a police procedural, involves French legal procedure, investigation by honest and efficient policemen, and corruption in the highest reaches of the French civil service. A winner, for pure enjoyment as well as for sound information. As Iagniappe, the cop is very nearly an improvement on the old Van Der Valk.

The D'Artagnan Signature (Putnam. Feb. 1976. ISBN 0-399-11681-8. $7.95) by Robert ROSTAND is full of activity, though rather windy, and takes place in the south of France. On one side are holdovers from the Algerian revolution of the 1960's—terrorists from the OAS, the clandestine organization of French colonists, on the track of the OAS war chest, and on the other are a youngish investigator, thwarted by his superior, a fat Corsican. A couple of drunken journalists suddenly get into the act, and one is used to track down the murderers and the money. A beautiful Arab girl is the love interest, and the ending is a cataclysm of double-crosses. Far from dull.

Bressio (Random. Jan. 1976. LC 75-10341. ISBN 0-394-49741-4. $6.95) is Richard SAPIR's first hardcover novel and it is a real winner. A New York private eye of Italian extraction with family connections in the Mafia is landed with a pair of paralyzingly stupid clients, a young junkie of wealthy background and her dropout boyfriend. The preposterous mismanagement of their lives leads to the murder of a tangential figure and to an astounding hoard of heroin used as bait by federal drug agents. Naturally the trap goes awry and the drugs vanish; spectacular killings end this riveting thriller.

The Chameleon Course (Coward. Jan. 1976. ISBN 0-698-10722-5. $7.95) by Donald SEAMAN takes place in England. A distinguished scientist, a defecting Russian, kills a burglar who has broken into his suburban house. Because of the vagaries of English law and the bloody-mindedness of an aged hanging judge, the defector's cover is blown and Russian assassins get onto his track. The suspense in this one is satisfactory enough, but the main interest lies in the technical details: the mechanics of English justice and the techniques of defection, more complicated than one would have thought, and the method to identify, to pursue, and to kill a defector.

With Dark Passage (Doubleday. 1975. LC 75-14848. ISBN 0-385-11240-8. $5.95) Andrew YORK gives us a change from his "ator" books, but the formula remains violence and sex, tried and true favorites. A large Englishman has just been released from jail, having done time for smuggling, and is promptly employed to be the skipper of a sail yacht for a wealthy magnate. This suspicious beginning leads to the mysterious murder of the owner and the arrest of the ex-con by the French police. His attempts to prove his innocence generate a good deal of tension, culminating in a super sea chase in a Mediterranean storm. Well up to scratch.

Deadline: 2 A.M. (Doubleday. Jan. 1976. LC 75-17073. ISBN 0-385-03563-2. $6.95) by Robert PIKE is a competent police procedural set in San Francisco. Two thugs kidnap a policeman on his way to his retirement party, and in fury the cops mobilize their full resources, which, I may add, are not very impressive. Through an informer they discover that the ransom is the release of two Italians from jail. This leads to suspicions of police connivance with the criminals and, from then on, down the well-trodden path of a drug connection. Unfortunately the police are just as stupid as the crooks, and the solution depends more on luck than on sound investigation.

A Killing for Charity (Coward. Jan. 1976. LC 75-28050. ISBN 0-698-10720-9. $7.95) by Arthur KAPLAN concerns a glum and abrasive private eye called Charity who has a peculiar obsession with bad food. She is employed by a New York lawyer to investigate the murder of a diamond dealer and the theft of a packet of precious stones. This leads from murder and theft to more murder and more theft, in the company of a glamorous but silly police lieutenant. The plot is clumsy, the characters rebarbative, and the solution fortuitous.

The Running of the Beasts (Putnam. Feb. 1976. ISBN 0-399-11647-8. $8.95) by Bill PRONZINI and Barry N. MALZBERG is a thriller about a small town in the Adirondacks in which three women have been brutally murdered by a local Jack the Ripper. Among the possible suspects are an ex-alcoholic ex-actor, an insecure but savage aging constable, a weak young reporter with a domineering mother, and an outwardly cool but inwardly seething state police lieutenant. As murder piles upon murder, terror increases in the town, especially among the women, until the climax is reached, not a minute too soon. Professional and busy with incident, but gloomy and fundamentally unsatisfying.

The Killing Kind (Houghton. Feb. 1976. $7.95) by Elliot WEST is a slightly old-fashioned macho-private-eye thriller in which the killing of two drug dealers leads to our man's employment by an eccentric millionaire to track down his wife, who has run away with an unsuitable Mafioso. It turns out that a fortune in diamonds is also missing, and that is what the millionaire is rather more anxious to get his hands on. The return of the jewelry involves a number of juicy murders and a graphic torture scene. The employer and his secretary get their comeuppance in the end, the best part of the book. Not much more than routine.

The plot of Gentleman Traitor (Harcourt. 1975. ISBN 0-15-135015-9. $8.95) by Alan WILLIAMS is inconsistent and unsewn but sneakily exciting. It all begins with the massacre of all the guests of a popular resort hotel in Rhodesia by a bunch of masked terrorists. From there it lurches to Moscow, to a depressed and regretful Kim Philby, from the defection of a senior British civil servant to the evil machinations of a crooked French financier. The story is awash with international intrigue punctuated by terrorist outrages, and a good time is had by all.

A Game of Wits

By JOHN J. HEALY

These true stories of crime and investigation are as exciting as any fiction and should prove very popular if displayed with your new mystery and suspense novels. "Hardhitting, but compassionate, the book should be a wave-maker."

TWO LIVES, TWO LANDS

By RUTH FREEMAN SOLOMON

With this novel, Ruth Freeman Solomon concludes her widely-acclaimed trilogy of the Pirov family. Ronya von Glasman Pirov, heroine of The Candlesticks and the Cross and The Eagle and the Dove, now fulfills the gypsy prophecy that she will lead "two lives in two lands" in a tale that takes her from Bolshevik Russia, to America, to British Palestine. Rich in intrigue, danger, and the passions of forbidden love, Two Lives, Two Lands is romantic fiction at its best—sure to delight the many fans of this master storyteller. $8.95

G.P. PUTNAM'S SONS
200 Madison Ave., N.Y. 10016

(Stein & Day. 1975. ISBN 0-8128-1870-9. $7.95) by Brian FREEMANTLE involves yet again leftover Nazis and that well-known treasure in Lake Toplitz. This one is slightly different in that the treasure also includes a list of the present disguises of the last remaining but particularly vicious Nazis, a list much lusted after by the Israelis, the Russians, and the Nazis themselves. This one is excited rather than exciting, not very sensible, and too clever by half.

Ogilvie, Tallant and Moon (Putnam. Jan. 1976. ISBN 0-399-11630-3. $6.95) by Chelsea Quinn YARBRO is not a very distinguished thriller which should have been better, what with a new and fresh investigator, an American Indian lawyer with magical powers. A woman friend, a doctor in a San Francisco clinic, is being sued for malpractice in the death of a child with an incurable disease. This leads by unsteady steps to the investigation of a pharmaceutical house and of their free sample drugs, medicines of dubious value, as well as to the sudden and mysterious death of a drug salesman. Unfortunately, the plot is transparent, save for the device which leads to the solution, and that is unbelievable.

The Left-Handed Sleeper (Putnam. Jan. 1976. ISBN 0-399-11621-4. $7.95) by Ted WILLIS is a complicated but not very interesting romantic spy thriller. A rising English politician takes it on the lam to Beirut after he discovers that he is being followed. His brave and trusting little wife takes refuge with one of the investigators and in turn flees to Lebanon. During all this the pol's loyal but unattractive secretary, entrusted with a satchel full of secret documents, gets blown up when she tampers with the lock. (I rather liked that part.) There are so many secret agents working both sides of the street, so many sleepers, such an amount of defecting that I was not at all clear who the friends or who the enemies were.

Down a Dark Alley (Doubleday. Jan. 1976. ISBN 0-385-11188-6. $5.95) by Genevieve HOLDEN is modestly suspenseful but has a highly romantic and jolly atmosphere. A young woman and her bouncy old grandmother live in a seedy neighborhood in Atlanta and are unexpectedly threatened by the imminent arrival of Aunt Charlotte, a devilish woman of high moral standards, and a young, attractive male relative. The story ambles along through the most jovial drinking I've seen since Thorne Smith, until the family gets entangled with a murder among the local Hell's Angels. The solution seems almost to be an afterthought, but there is an agreeable romance, and the tone is high-spirited and amusing, even allowing for incipient cirrhosis.

High, Wide and Ransom (Pocket Bks: S. & S., dist. by Pocket Bks.-Ace. Jan. 1976. pap. $1.25) by Don TRACY is neither more simple-minded nor more trivial than many others. A mindless, semimacho ex-sergeant in the MP's is now a private investigator operating out of Washington. He is hijacked by a pretty but exceptionally wicked girl and by an IRA man, both apparently members of a violent anarchist organization. The private eye naturally goes in pursuit. Synthetic and the same old twaddle; the demand will depend on the luridness of the cover.

Among the standbys are A Blast of Trumpets (Holt. Jan. 1976. LC 75-923. ISBN 0-03-014101-X. $6.95) by John Creasey writing as Gordon ASHE; there is a new 87th Precinct mystery by Ed McBAIN called Blood Relatives (Random. 1975. LC 75-10308. ISBN 0-394-48582-3. $6.95); there is yet another Maigret story by Georges SIMENON called Maigret and the Black Sheep (Helen & Kurt Wolff: Harcourt. Feb. 1976. ISBN 0-15-155146-4. $6.95); The Pimlico Plot (Doubleday. Jan. 1976. LC 75-6272. ISBN 0-385-11041-3. $5.95) is Mary McMULLEN's new superromantic thriller.—Henri C. Veit, Brooklyn P.L.

ASSISTANT CITY LIBRARIAN-Extension Services. Seattle Public Library is an exciting, challenging, rewarding and demanding employer. If you are ready to accept the gauntlet, read on. Not satisfied with being one of the best libraries in the nation, we want to improve. We are looking for a strong, innovative administrator who will mold a cohesive, responsive organization and improve patron service while being cost-effective. This means taking the extension services resources, which are 224 full and part-time service oriented employees, 16 branch libraries, 7 stations, an active outreach program, mobile services and delivery service and developing and implementing short and long-range plans, for which you will be held accountable, within the library's objectives of the best possible service at the lowest cost. This will require developing data that provides indicators for shifts in service emphasis and planning for those shifts, developing employees, being active in and knowledgeable of the community, communicating 360 degrees, planning buildings, preparing budgets and providing frequent reports on progress. Salary range is currently $19,380-$20,952 depending on experience, with a 10% increase anticipated in late December, plus a full range of employee benefits. If you haven't thrown up your hands in despair and have an M.L.S. from an ALA accredited school of librarianship, 5 years of progressively more responsible administrative public library experience, knowledge of current state of the art of librarianship and would like to live in the incomparable Pacific Northwest, on the shores of Puget Sound, 2 hours from great skiing or the ocean, and despite what Thomas Wolfe said, a cultural center, then send your résumé post haste by February 15, 1976 to: Ken Ragland, Seattle Public Library, Seattle, Washington 98104. An equal opportunity employer.

COORDINATOR-Technical Support Services. Talk about change. Seattle Public Library Technical Support Services is plunging into the 20th century via participation in the Washington Library Network automated modules for acquisitions and bibliographics, which are in implementation phase, while improving the high level of support that the public service division has come to expect. The person we want must be able to continue this program, be cost-effective, develop short and medium-range goals which may include evaluation of an automated circulation module, microform public catalog services with CRT capability and evaluate the impace and costs of a change in classification systems to current Dewey or LC. The areas of administrative responsibilities include cataloging, acquisitions, preparations, bindery and circulation. The resources include approximately 80 full and part-time dedicated employees, $700,000 annual division budget. SPL will have a 1976 materials budget of $735,000 and has a materials collection of 1.6 million volumes. SPL doesn't have problems, but we do have challenges that won't quit for the right person. If you are fearless, can leap tall stacks of books in a single bound, and have an M.L.S. from an ALA accredited school of librarianship, 5 years of progressively more responsible administrative technical services library experience, speak computerese fluently and have demonstrated problem solving abilities, send your résumé to: Ken Ragland, Seattle Public Library, Seattle, Washington 98104. A stimulating ambiance, good employee benefits, and we pay a salary of $15,936-$18,636 per annum depending on experience plus a 10% increase due in December. Don't delay, send today, or at least by February 15, 1976. An equal opportunity employer.

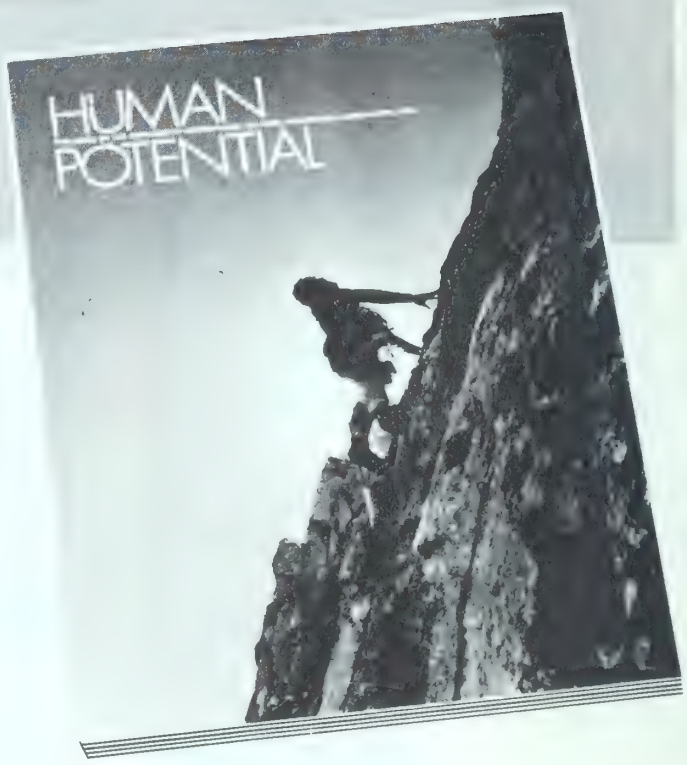
ANNOUNCING

HUMAN POTENTIAL

PUBLISHED BY THE AMBASSADOR INTERNATIONAL CULTURAL FOUNDATION



A new magazine that explores man's quest for accomplishment, creativity and quality of life — the noble side of man — past, present and future.

The subject is man — his uniqueness, his achievements, his challenges and expanding horizons. HUMAN POTENTIAL is a bold and ambitious endeavor to examine and highlight all aspects of man's potential, and his efforts to realize it. As the title suggests, the magazine focuses on the constructive side of man, but it does not ignore the difficulties he faces.

HUMAN POTENTIAL sets out to be both entertaining and informative, and to achieve depth and literary excellence. It will present articles by accepted authorities and first rate observers. Authors slated for early issues include such names as Isaac Asimov, Harrison Salisbury, Alistair Cooke, William Masters and Virginia Johnson, J. B. Rhine, and William Kaufmann.

Areas of special emphasis include: the nature and unique characteristics of man; artistic and scientific achievement; cross-cultural perspectives; planetary concern (global ecology, population control, etc.); international relations with a view toward the individual, and the study of the future.

The magazine also strives for superlative graphics. It is abundantly furnished with illustrations, most of them in color.

HUMAN POTENTIAL is published bi-monthly by the Ambassador International Cultural Foundation, a non-profit organization.

Upcoming in HUMAN POTENTIAL:

- Isaac Asimov: The Science Fiction Writer as Prophet
- Jean-Pierre Hallet: To Save a People
- Masters and Johnson: The Pleasure Bond
- William Kaufmann: The Cosmic Horizons of Human Consciousness
- Alistair Cooke: What Really Happened in 1776 — a British View of the American Spirit
- J. B. Rhine: Parapsychology: A Declaration of Independence from Materialism

The Judy Garland Souvenir Songbook

Compiled and Edited by Howard Harmon

The first comprehensive collection of Judy Garland's songs celebrates in music and photographs her vibrant legacy. Alongside 80 stunningly reproduced pictures of Judy are the scores to 68 of the songs she made famous and stamped with her personality—songs by Richard Rodgers, Cole Porter, and other reigning geniuses of the music world. Special features include a complete Garland filmography, listings of "Judy Garland's Most Famous Concerts" and of her television appearances, and a single and album discography.

A READY REFERENCE AND A "WHO'S-WHO" OF THE MAJOR CORPORATIONS IN CANADA

Recommended for every U.S. library

No library department concerned with Canadian economic affairs should be without this researched-in-depth encyclopedia of the current dominant business community in Canada.

This handsome volume contains over 800 fact-filled pages and is perhaps the most concise profile of the Canadian business community ever printed.

Business index of 2000 companies

In it you'll find a business index that gives key information such as location, ownership, size, nature of business and chief executive officers of 2000 of the foremost companies in Canada . . . the most qualitative data available anywhere.

Rankings of leading Canadian Corporations

The Canadian Business Magazine's* "Top 200": a ranking of leading Canadian companies by sales, assets and net income. In addition, lists of the top 100 advertisers and the 100 most active stocks.

In-depth profiles of 100 major Canadian Companies

This section gives thorough analyses and profiles of 100 of Canada's leading corporations. It explains precisely what they do, who their chief executives are, and delivers the complete inside story of the company, ie: history, philosophy, role in the economy, etc.

In short, The Blue Book of Canadian Business 1976, a hard cover, handsomely bound volume for permanent reference, is possibly the most complete documentation of the current Canadian business scene ever undertaken . . . no library would be complete without it.

After July 31, 1976: $1,140.00

Compiled by R. Glenn Wright, Michigan State University

The unique and unprecedented research tool, the Title Bibliography allows the user who can only identify a work by its title to locate complete bibliographic information on all novels and short stories in LC's Fiction Shelf List (Class PZ3). In addition to the main file of approximately 133,000 entries, the Title Bibliography includes a list of translations, an Index to Translators and a Pseudonym Index.

9 Volumes ISBN 0-8161-0020-9
Prepublication price: $495.00

☐ CORNELL UNIVERSITY LIBRARIES SOUTHEAST ASIA CATALOG

This catalog represents one of the largest and most comprehensive collections on Southeast Asia in the world. Over 106,000 cards cover books, periodicals, newspapers, maps, and microfilm in Western and Asian languages. Particularly strong are the vernacular collections in Thai, Indonesian and Vietnamese.

7 Volumes ISBN 0-8161-0045-5
Prepublication price: $475.00

☐ THE CATALOG OF THE NAVAL OBSERVATORY LIBRARY
WASHINGTON, D.C.

An outstanding astronomy resource, this catalog covers all types of literature on all areas of astronomy—technical works, textbooks, popular books, bibliographies, many complete series of observatory and scientific society publications, most of the journals relating to astronomy, as well as star catalogs, astronomical ephemerides and nautical almanacs from all countries.

6 Volumes. ISBN 0-8161-0031-4
Prepublication price: $390.00
After July 31, 1976: $490.00

Prices do not include shipping and handling charges. Prices outside the U.S. are 10% higher.

Passion, peril, and imposture... shipwreck, alchemy, and transformation add drama to the SPRING LIST of

Johns Hopkins

with the only complete edition of

Mary Shelley

Collected Tales and Stories edited by Charles E. Robinson with original engravings

Set against varying backdrops of medieval chivalry, the wars and revolutions of her age, and grandiose scenes of nature, Mary Shelley's tales mark a high point in the Gothic storytelling art.

The publishing of a new, meticulously annotated and corrected version, after a lapse of almost eighty years, will help give a more balanced view of the literary reputation of a woman who is known chiefly as the author of Frankenstein and the wife of Percy Bysshe Shelley.

The fine original engravings which accompanied the stories when they first appeared, are all reproduced here, lending the volume considerable period charm.

432 pages. 15 illustrations. LC 75-36931. 0-8018-1706-4, $15.00

Family and Society

Selections from the Annales: Économies, Sociétés, Civilisations, edited by Robert Forster and Orest Ranum

Family and Society treats aspects of family life from the time of the Roman Empire to the eighteenth century in Europe. It explores child-rearing customs, inheritance laws, dowries and marriage practices, pregnancies, illegitimate births, and the life of peasant and elite families. 288 pages. Illustrations. LC 75-36940. 0-8018-1780-3, $12.95 hardcover. 0-8018-1781-1, $3.45 paperback

The Making of a Missile Crisis: October 1962

Herbert S. Dinerstein

Dinerstein explores the assumptions and perceptions held by American, Cuban and Soviet leaders during the Cuban events of October 1962. Correcting the American bias of earlier appraisals, his scrutiny of the Soviet and Cuban press reveals the immediate reactions of the chief actors to the crisis. 336 pages. LC 75-36943. 0-8018-1788-9, $14.95.

Israel Divided

Demonstrators argue sharply with Rabin

Ideological Politics in the Jewish State
Rael Jean Isaac

Foreseeing a resurgence of ideological politics that will have profound consequences for Israel's quest for survival, political sociologist Rael Isaac provides the first assessment of Israel extremist movements. 208 pages. LC 75-36944. 0-8018-1737-4, $10.95

Arms for the Arabs

The Soviet Union and War in the Middle East
Jon Glassman

Treating as a continuum the 1956, 1967, and 1973 wars in the Middle East, the author charts the Soviet Union's participation in the events, examining the strategy behind arms shipments and political support 272 pages. LC 75-29254. 0-8018-1747-1, $12.50.

Sex, Age, and Work

The Changing Composition of the Labor Force
Juanita Kreps and Robert Clark

The employee in the late twentieth century will more often be female, more often not married, more often a college graduate, and likely to have a view of work that is quite different from the blue-collar male family head. In a lively discussion of the subject, the authors set forth the policy implications involved. Policy Studies in Employment and Welfare Illustrations. LC 75-34452. 0-8018-1806-0, $7.50 hardcover. 0-8018-1807-9, $2.65 paperback

The Job Corps

A Social Experiment that Works
Sar A. Levitan and Benjamin H. Johnston

The Job Corps was possibly the most controversial social program launched by the Great Society. The authors examine how the program was formulated, its present significance, and possible modification and improvements. Policy Studies in Employment and Welfare Illustrations. LC 75-36948. 0-8018-1804-4, $8.00 hardcover. 0-0818-1805-2, $2.95 paperback

Early Form Sequences, 1927-1932
by Kurt Kranz
texts by Hans Richter, Werner Haftmann, and Werner Hofmann

The painter, Kurt Kranz, is one of the pioneers in our time of serial, variable, and multiple art. The decisive creative impulses in his artistic life were acquired at the Bauhaus, where he attended courses by Klee, Kandinsky, and Albers.

This book deals with abstract form sequences and film designs from the years 1927 to 1932, some of which Kranz sketched and executed while at the Bauhaus, Dessau. The early work of this artist in many ways anticipates the trends of modern art. This richly illustrated art book contains 50 color panels, 55 full-page, black and white reproductions in the original size and 4 double-page master panels.

Gaudí: His Life, His Theories, His Work
by César Martinell translated from the Spanish by Judith Rohrer edited by George R. Collins

This magnificent volume is a fitting monument to the Catalan architect, Antonio Gaudí. It is the only book on Gaudí that is fully commensurate with the dimensions of his greatness, and in its completeness and detail it simply supplants all previous accounts. All of Gaudí's projects are illustrated in 555 photographs of buildings, sculptures, furnishing, and plans, including 60 full-color plates—a significant feature, since color was an integral part of Gaudí's architectural realizations. Many of these illustrations depict objects unearthed by the author in recent years and are made available here for the first time.

"A great and magnificent work . . . a masterpiece."
—Samuel Eliot Morison

A NEW AGE NOW BEGINS

A People's History of the American Revolution
by Page Smith

He brings the People's Revolution home to the people in the first new look at the American Revolution in almost a century. A popular history on the grand scale, it is "monumental in scope and content" (Library Journal). "Bound to be torn apart and praised to the skies" (Book Forum). Belongs in every home, school and library.

The Character of John Adams

by Peter Shaw

Instead of recounting, in detail, the public events of John Adams's extraordinary career, Peter Shaw views as a whole Adams's character, thought, and acts—personalizing for the reader the most remote of our Founding Fathers. Shaw's Adams is a model of artistic compression. A Selection of the History Book Club. Published for the Institute of Early American History and Culture. 1254 / Mar. 1 / illus. / $14.95 Tr

Carolina Home Gardener

by Chris Florance

A charming, informative book that tells exactly how to grow flowers, fruits, and vegetables on small suburban lots, in spite of poor soil and drainage. This "garden of the future" guarantees beauty, a well-stocked freezer, and food to give away.

1258 / Mar. / illus. / $9.95 Tr

The Development of English Glassmaking, 1560–1640

by Eleanor S. Godfrey

Throws new light on the controversial and important chapter of English economic history when glass-making was transformed from an insignificant medieval craft into a substantial industry.

Populist Vanguard

A HISTORY OF THE SOUTHERN FARMERS' ALLIANCE

by Robert C. McMath, Jr.

The most detailed account available of the Alliance, including its conjunction with the Populist party. McMath suggests that the ideas advanced by the People's party in the 1890s had been incubated within the Farmers' Alliance. 1251 / Jan. / $13.95

The American Situation

THE CAMERA'S CENTURY
CATALOG OF A BICENTENNIAL EXHIBITION

Foreword by Joseph C. Sloane

These photographs speak loud and clear about what it meant to be an American during the past century or more. They are documents but they are also works of art. A memorable collection, courtesy of The Museum of Modern Art, George Eastman House, the Library of Congress, and The University of North Carolina at Chapel Hill.

Old Man's Gold and Other Stories

by Ovid Pierce

A remarkable portrait of a long ago place and time is presented in these early stories of a gifted novelist. "Beautiful and instructive. If they have a fault it is only that there are not more of them."

—FRANCES GRAY PATTON 1257 / Feb. / $6.95 Tr

New York City Mutual Savings Banks, 1819–1861

by Alan L. Olmstead

Offers a unique view of often ignored business practices and philanthropic activities of an important set of entrepreneurs during the formative years of American capitalism. 1265 / spring / $15.95

Electoral Mobilization and Public Opinion

THE VENEZUELAN CAMPAIGN OF 1973

by John D. Martz and Enrique A. Baloyra

Drawn from personal observations, interviews with party elites, a nationwide survey, and six months of travel with the major presidential candidates, this study offers a wealth of information for students of political development. 1268 / spring / $17.95

Economic Growth and Neighborhood Discontent

SYSTEM BIAS IN THE

by Clarence N. Stone

This analysis of urban renewal politics in one of the nation's most dynamic cities offers an alternative to the pluralist theory of community power and policy formation. 1262 / spring / 13.95

Franz Schurmann
THE LOGIC OF WORLD POWER

An Inquiry into the Origins, Currents, and Contradictions of World Politics. Nominated for the 1974 NBA in Contemporary Affairs, this extraordinary book analyzes how ideology and bureaucratic power work to produce foreign policy in both America and China. "This book will be a classic in the field."—Choice. Paperback Giant $6.95 (73187-5)

Tove Jansson
SUN CITY

After her sharp and insightful portrait in The Summer Book of a Finnish grandmother who enchanted thousands of readers, Tove Jansson now turns to look at the darker side of growing old, and has written what Madeleine L'Engle calls "an indictment of the American way of old age." $7.95 (49907-7)

Douglas Hay, Peter Linebaugh, John G. Rule, E. P. Thompson, and Calvin Winslow
ALBION'S FATAL TREE

Crime and Society in Eighteenth-Century England. A new approach to history, concentrating on the seamy underside of the past—smugglers, highwaymen, poachers and public executions. "Without doubt, this will be a seminal book. It ought to be made compulsory reading. Close, meticulous scholarship and the driving force of commitment make it memorable."—The Manchester Guardian. Companion volume to Whigs and Hunters. Illustrations and maps. $15 (47120-2); Paperback Giant $5.95 (73085-2)

E. P. Thompson
WHIGS AND HUNTERS

The Origin of the Black Act. The author of The Making of the English Working Class re-examines eighteenth-century England's social and political climate in light of the period's rampant corruption and lawlessness. "E. P. Thompson is unrivalled among historians for his distinctive blend of biting irony, probing analytic intelligence, passionate moral commitment and sheer rhetorical skill." —KEITH THOMAS, New Statesman. Illus. with photos. Companion volume to Albion's Fatal Tree. $15 (40011-9); Paperback Giant $5.95 (73086-0)

March

THE FACTS OF LIFE

An Essay in Feelings, Facts, and Fantasy. In many ways the most intensely personal and unorthodox book to date from the author of Knots and The Politics of Experience, R. D. Laing examines how we feel and what forces (pre-natal care, birth, early childhood experience) shape our lives and thoughts. $7.95 (49666-3)

Daniel Guttman and Barry Willner
THE SHADOW GOVERNMENT

The Government's Multi-billion-dollar Giveaway of Its Decision-making Powers to Private Management Consultants, "Experts," and Think Tanks. Introduction by Ralph Nader. What these groups promise, what they deliver, and how well they serve public interest are the subjects at the core of this important study. Previously announced. $10 (49244-7)

David Milton and Nancy Dall Milton
THE WIND WILL NOT SUBSIDE

Years in Revolutionary China—1964-1969. "In understanding China and revolution, there can be no substitute for the reason, compassion, and experience that the Miltons brilliantly yet simply use to make alive the unfolding of the Cultural Revolution." — FRANZ SCHURMANN. Illus. with photos. The Pantheon Asia Library. $15 (48555-6); Paperback Giant $4.95 (70936-5)

April

Ingmar Bergman FACE TO FACE

A Film by Ingmar Bergman. While closely related in tone and mood to the director's explosive Scenes from a Marriage, Face to Face is a totally different story that concerns a gifted professional woman's shocking breakdown, attempted suicide, and ultimate rebirth. Illus. with stills from the film. $7.95 (40452-1); Paperback Giant $2.95 (73206-5)

Richard Burack, M.D., F.A.C.P. with Fred J. Fox, M.D.
THE 1976 HANDBOOK OF PRESCRIPTION DRUGS

Updated and Expanded. Listing virtually every prescription drug by brand and generic name, the latest prices, drugs for children, and the top 200 drugs prescribed, this book is "the best way we know to beat the high cost of prescription drugs."—New York Magazine. $12.95 (40604-4)

AZED, Puzzle Editor of The London Observer
THE WORLD'S MOST DIFFICULT CROSSWORD PUZZLES

These thirty-six original and diabolical puzzles are guaranteed to satisfy even the most sophisticated and demanding of lexicophiles. The author's American Introduction provides detailed information on the special techniques used in solving British crosswords. Paperback $3.95 (73186-7)

Robert Bristow
ACHES AND PAINS

How the Older Person Can Find Relief Using Heat, Massage, and Exercise. Introduction by Edward J. Lorenze, M.D. Seventy step-by-step illustrations with large, easy-to-read type show the person over 45 how to successfully alleviate the aches and pains associated with advancing age, unaccustomed physical activity, or old injuries. $8.95 (49163-7)

Ivan Illich
MEDICAL NEMESIS

The Dangers of Modern Medicine. Modern medicine has reached the stage where it is itself a major threat to our health. This is the thesis of Ivan Illich's most recent and controversial book which poses basic questions not only about medicine but about the direction of modern society. $8.95 (40225-1)

Jean-Paul Sartre
SARTRE ON THEATER

Edited by Michel Contat and Michel Rybalka. In this first collection of his writings on the theater, one of this century's most famous playwrights and philosophers discusses each of his major plays, the theory of theater which underlies them, and the role of the theater in contemporary society. $10.95 (49247-1)

N. J. Block and Gerald Dworkin, Editors
THE IQ CONTROVERSY

The first critical reader to explore the biological, social, and psychological issues involved in the controversy over IQ testing. Includes articles by Noam Chomsky, Walter Lippmann, Leon Kamin and Richard Herrnstein. $15.95 (49056-8); Paperback Giant $6.95 (73087-9)

Orville Schell
BRIONES: THE TOWN THAT SAVED ITSELF

With 60 photographs by Ilka Hartmann. A moving, dramatic narrative of the struggles of the inhabitants of a small picturesque California town against the developers, state and federal bureaucrats, and polluters who sought to block their plan of limiting growth and stymie their efforts to build an ecologically viable community through new ways of owning land, alternative energy, and waste disposal systems. $15 (48498-3); paperback $6.95 (73169-7)

June

Robert Brandon, Jonathan Rowe, and Thomas H. Stanton
A CITIZEN HANDBOOK FOR TAX REFORM

Introduction by Ralph Nader. Income and property taxes, who pays, how much and why, and what taxpayers can do to fight unfair taxes are examined by staff members of Nader's Citizen Tax Reform Research Group. $15 (49847-X); Paperback Giant $6.95 (73092-5)

Peter Dickinson
KING AND JOKER

Set in Buckingham Palace and featuring a marvelous, if imaginary, royal family with more than its share of skeletons in the royal closet, this is another wonderfully and outrageously plotted mystery by the author of The Poison Oracle and The Lively Dead. $6.95 (40603-6)

Michele B. Slung, Editor
CRIME ON HER MIND

Fifteen Stories of Female Sleuths from the Victorian Era to the Forties. "A delightful and nostalgic potpourri."—Publishers Weekly. "Fascinating."—N.Y. Times. Paperback Giant $3.95 (73217-0)

Atlas of Early American History

The Revolutionary Era, 1760-1790

Lester J. Cappon, Editor-in-Chief
Barbara Bartz Petchenik, Cartographic Editor
John Hamilton Long, Assistant Editor

A spectacular publication for the nation's Bicentennial, the Atlas of Early American History includes 286 newly drawn maps describing all aspects of America from 1760 to 1790. Cultural characteristics, military history, politics, demography, manufacturing, and commerce are explored in maps which employ the latest cartographic skills—271 are in as many as six colors. A section of text and bibliography supplements each map or series of maps. More than fifteen years in the making, the Atlas blends the art and craft of the cartographer and historian to provide an inestimably valuable perspective on the beginnings of our nation.

Published for the Newberry Library and the Institute of Early American History and Culture

Thomas Jefferson's Paris

Howard C. Rice, Jr.

This handsomely illustrated picture book provides a remarkable glimpse of the Paris Jefferson knew—Paris on the eve of the French Revolution. The houses, gardens, bookshops, theaters, and landmarks of the time are brought to life through delightful commentary and 189 drawings, paintings, and maps.

LOW-COST, ENERGY-EFFICIENT SHELTER
For the Owner and Builder
edited by EUGENE ECCLI. Many of North America's leading architects and engineers show how to plug energy leaks in the house, slash maintenance costs, and save thousands when building a new home. Uniquely comprehensive, the book ranges from simple winterizing projects to elaborate renovations — with complete plans for 14 homes.
Index / Appendix / Bibliography / 150 illustrations / Glossary / ISBN: 0-87857-116-7 $10.95 hardcover / 0-87857-114-0 / $5.95 paperback / February by GENE LOGSDON. A day-by-day companion for novice and veteran gardeners, it blends latest scientific findings with practical tips from hundreds of successful soil tillers.

THE GARDENER'S GUIDE TO BETTER SOIL
Index / Over 80 illustrations, charts, photos / ISBN: 0-87857-106-X / $7.95 hardcover / January

BZZZ: A BEEKEEPER'S PRIMER
by EVELYN FATIGATI. For youngsters (and, indeed, for adults, too!) this charming story of a 12-year-old's apprenticeship as a beekeeper is packed with fascinating, useful information about bees.
45 illustrations by author / ISBN: 0-87857-119-1 / $4.95 hardcover / April

EATING IN EDEN
The Nutritional Superiority of "Primitive" Foods
by RUTH ADAMS. A noted nutritionist examines primitive societies, past and present, to discover what they eat . . . and how it has helped or hurt them.
Index / ISBN: 0-87857-109-4 / $8.95 hardcover / March

ORGANIC PLANT PROTECTION
A Comprehensive Reference on Controlling Insects and Diseases in the Garden, Orchard, and Yard — Without Chemicals edited by ROGER YEPSEN. Without question, the most complete guide of its kind. Section One of this 550-page volume covers centuries-old and modern control strategies; Section Two is an encyclopedic survey of the common pests and diseases of over 150 vegetables, fruits, berries, and trees.
Index / Appendices / Bibliography / Over 200 photos and drawings, more than half in color / ISBN: 0-87857-110-8 / $12.95 hardcover / May by JULIETTE DE BAIRACLI LEVY. An internationally-respected expert has written the first veterinary herbal for preventing and treating the maladies common to sheep, goats, cows, horses, poultry, sheepdogs, and bees.

THE HERBAL HANDBOOK FOR FARM AND STABLE
Index / Appendix / ISBN: 0-87857-120-5 $7.95 hardcover / 0-87857-115-9 / $3.95 paperback / April

THE HOMESTEADER'S HANDBOOK TO RAISING SMALL LIVESTOCK
by JEROME BELANGER. Diet, housing, disease, breeding — here's everything the livestock raiser needs to know about tending goats, chickens, sheep, geese, rabbits, hogs, turkeys, guinea fowl, duck, or pigeons for food, manure, or income.
Index / 45 illustrations / ISBN: 0-87857-122-1 / $3.95 paperback / February

STEP-BY-STEP TO ORGANIC VEGETABLE GROWING
by SAM OGDEN. Over 100,000 copies sold in hardcover, it's now available for the first time in paperback! Engagingly written, compact but amazingly complete—it's treasured by neophytes and veterans alike.
Index / 95 Illustrations / ISBN: 0-87857-112-4 / $3.95 paperback / January

TERRIFIC TOMATOES
All About How To Grow and Enjoy Them
compiled by CATHARINE O. FOSTER. Another hardcover best seller, now available in paperback! The most complete advice ever published on growing, eating, preserving, and cooking tomatoes.
Index / 35 illustrations / ISBN: 0-87857-111-6 / $3.95 paperback / January

A CLEAR VIEW
A Guide to Industrial Pollution Control by JAMES CANNON. An action manual for concerned citizens who want to know how to get and evaluate data, and how to use them through legal, legislative, and public pressure tactics.
Index / over 25 photographs and charts / ISBN: 0-87857-125-X / $6.95 hardcover / 0-87857-124-8 / $3.95 paperback / April

Electric Children

ROOTS AND BRANCHES OF MODERN FOLKROCK
JACQUES VASSAL
Translated and adapted by Paul Barnett

In the early 1960s the two main forms of American popular music—folk music and rock 'n' roll—began to fuse into a new kind of music that has come to be known as folkrock. This new music became a force of its own, and for an entire generation of "electric children" it became inextricably linked to the tumultuous events and social upheaval of one of the most explosive decades in American history. In this well-illustrated book Jacques Vassal gives a brilliant synthesis of the folkrock phenomenon, its social background and its musical heritage.

320 pp. April $11.95t

JOHN BAXTER

John Baxter gives a knowing, incisive, hilarious account of the European artists—the stars, directors, screenwriters, and technicians—who came to Hollywood during its formative days and through the 30s and 40s: Marlene Dietrich, Josef von Sternberg, F. W. Murnau, Ronald Colman, Hugh Walpole, Max Reinhardt, and others. Unusual illustrations and often bizarre anecdotes abound in this lively and entertaining portrait of the exiles who came to inhabit that absurdist landscape called Hollywood.

232 pp. April $14.95

A BIOGRAPHY
JEAN JULES-VERNE
Translated by Roger Greaves

This probing, full-bodied portrait of the great science fiction and adventure novelist Jules Verne will be the definitive biography. Written by his grandson, it enjoys the benefits of personal insight coupled with the authority of thoughtful, scrupulous scholarship. Because of the many scientific developments that Jules Verne anticipated by decades or more, this book will intrigue all those who have been delighted and astounded by his timeless stories.

JOYCE CAROL OATES

★ Crossing the Border. In this new collection of short stories by one of America's foremost literary figures the scene is often set in Canada, in the great land beyond our border. Residing as she does in that country, Miss Oates writes with an intimate knowledge of the people whose stories she tells with her matchless artistry. $7.95

ROBIN LLOYD

★ For Money or Love: Boy Prostitution in America. Introduction by Senator Birch Bayh. This book, by an award-winning investigative NBC reporter, exposes a national problem of which most people are unaware: boy prostitution. Perhaps 300,000 boys aged 8 to 17 (chickens) are selling themselves sexually to male adults (chickenhawks) throughout the country every day. This book tells who these people are, what they do, and why they do it. It probes the situation in cities and towns in every part of the U.S.—revealing that none is immune from scandal. FOR MONEY OR LOVE will command national attention and bring shocked American readers face to face with an underside of life they've heard about only in whispers, if at all. $8.95

CLIFFORD STONE

★ The Great Sunflower. This is the deeply moving story of two boys growing into manhood in the New London of the sixties, when that great whaling city is changing rapidly from a bastion of revolutionary spirit into a super-highway submarine base. Here Ethan, in love with the magnificent mansion and gardens in which he works, representing for him all the beauty, good of the past, slowly disintegrates, while Tom, decrying the rottenness overcoming the city, tries valiantly to save him. This is no ordinary novel of that period—there are no rock groups, no overt political struggles. It presents, rather, the unusual situation of the "under thirty" generation feeling the gigantic tug between past and present—a struggle that ends in a momentous crescendo of action and feeling. Vanguard is proud to introduce with this work a writer in whom it has strong faith—a novel that perhaps can best be compared to John Knowles's A Separate Peace. $7.95

ANNE NALL STALLWORTH, author of This Time Next Year

★ Where the Bright Lights Shine. A new novel of Southern family life by an author who has already won high praise. When the Snows move from their cotton farm to a house "in town" their lives erupt as the new environment reveals hitherto hidden and explosive hate-love passions. $7.95

ELVA OGLANBY

MIRABELLE BEAULIEU

★ The Cooking of Provincial Quebec. Here in one cookbook is a collection of French-Canadian recipes that have been handed down for centuries in a part of Canada where hospitality and good food have always been an important way of life. A short introduction on the history of habitant cooking is followed by 150 recipes, from the richest fare to simple, hearty dishes—all of them unusual treats. Color plates.* $9.95

EDITH REDMAN

★ Recipes for Healthier Families. Graham Kerr, "The Galloping Gourmet," heartily endorses this new family cookbook for its useful information on the nutritional needs of children, teenagers, and adults. It contains a wealth of tasty, nutritious recipes. Edith Redman writes in a breezy style with plenty of sound advice about vitamins, food additives, teen-age snacks, family meals, etc.* $7.95

BRIAN BLACKSTOCK and JOHN LATIMER

★ Camp Counsellor's Handbook. The authors have combined many years of camping experience to produce this practical guide for the prospective or practicing camp counsellor. It covers counsellors' responsibilities, campers' needs, and camp activities with detailed, specific, practical guidance. Highly recommended by Ernest F. Schmidt, former Executive Vice President of the American Camping Association.* Paper $4.95

LJ LETTERS

Craig who? Right on Wray and Josey!

Kenneth Peeples, Jr.
East Orange Public Library, New Jersey

I wish to commend LJ for continuing to print responses to E. J. Josey's important survey "Can Library Affirmative Action Succeed?" (LJ, January 1, 1975, p. 28-31). Specifically, I refer to the forceful and insightful letter from Wendell L. Wray (LJ, October 1, 1975, p. 1748). It is hoped that this eloquent plea for justice and the elimination of racism in minority recruitment does not fall on deaf ears.

On the other hand, it is disappointing indeed, if not somewhat cynical, to follow Wray's rejoinder with an ad hominem attack on Josey. Craig Robinson (LJ, October 1, 1975, p. 1748) does not deal with the essentials of Josey's article or letter, but merely sidetracks the harsh realities of Josey's indictment. Apologists for gradualism and/or inaction who seem to be hiding under the cover of "dialogue and understanding" underline the urgent need of effective affirmative action.

Sheila Smith
Librarian, Kellogg Community College, Battle Creek, Michigan

Right on to Wendell Wray and E. J. Josey for pointing out the need for greater numbers of minorities in the library profession. As a fairly recent black graduate of library school and a new member of the profession, I can speak with authority when I say, "Racism is alive and well in this profession." Could we possibly have the naivete to attribute the absence of blacks and other minorities to the philosophy of "benign neglect"?

John L. Ayala
President, REFORMA, the National Association of Spanish Speaking Librarians in the United States, Long Beach, California

As a brown librarian, who has been reading the continuing correspondence concerning E. J. Josey's article, I can only say that many people (librarians) talk about Affirmative Action (AA) but few do anything about it.

Josey's article was honest, direct, and factual. There has been no great effort by library schools or agencies to recruit, train, or hire minorities or a greater number of them would be reflected in the statistics of our profession. It seems to me, after reading the literature of AA, that the most progress in this area has come after some type of legal action has been taken against a library agency.

I wonder if there would be this much discussion about AA if we were not in a tight job market. Anglo librarians were willing to share the pie with us when there was an abundance, but now that the pie has shrunk there is great resistance and a recurrence of subtle institutional racism.

AA can be made effective, but there has to be institutional commitment and the commitment of Anglo and minority librarians.

Tough copyright, pro & con

Paul Hill
Legal Research Librarian, Creighton University, Omaha, Nebraska

About two years ago I accurately predicted that it would be futile to attempt to compromise with the publishing industry on copyright. Now some publishers are resorting to misstating the law in an attempt to intimidate librarians.

LJ reports that Pergamon publications carry a warning to the effect that copying is illegal (October 1, 1975, p.1753-54). Not necessarily! It all depends on the facts. Copying done in accordance with fair use principles, as spelled out in numerous cases over the years, is entirely legal. Williams & Wilkins, insofar as it has any value at all, affirmed existing law. (I also correctly predicted that ultimately Williams & Wilkins would not be important.) Despite all the legislative activity and spilled ink, the copyright statute has not been changed, nor have cases modified the fair use exemption.

While I certainly do not advocate illegal copying, I would have no hesitation in making a copy from a Pergamon publication within the area of fair use, as defined in existing case law. What Congress may or may not do is irrelevant to this point.

I urge librarians to treat the Pergamon-type caveats with the contempt they deserve.

Donald C. Rowland
Director of Library Services, Black Hawk College, Moline, Illinois

The Copyright Reform Bill is under consideration for Congressional action. I think it is in the best interest of authors, publishers, and printers that whenever copyrighted material is reproduced for whatever purpose, the copyright holder should be remunerated.

I am essentially concerned with preserving the profit motive of authors and publishers in our valued free-enterprise system. Even one uncompensated reproduction lessens the revenue to the copyright holder. A weak copyright law will lessen profit, and it will weaken the profit incentive. Authors write not only to express themselves, but also to gain financially. Publishers are almost entirely profit motivated. Printers probably do not care so much about copyright protection as about who is paying the printing bill.

If authors only wished to disseminate their ideas and forget about potential profit, authors would pay the printing and distribution costs. But it is the publisher who usually goes out on a limb. He takes the author's work to the printer, markets the material, and pays author, printer, and publisher costs. The publisher needs to pay the bills and make a profit if he intends to stay in business. Each and every copy which is printed or reproduced should generate revenue in order to keep the entire publishing process on a profit level.

I support the preservation of the profit motive in our free-enterprise system. I support a strong copyright law which will insure that each and every reproduction will guarantee monetary compensation to the copyright holder.

El Paso's cooperative spirit

Carla N. Vasquez
Assistant Director, El Paso Public Library, Texas

After reading the LJ account of the San Francisco Public Library's struggle to retain CETA-Title II monies for personnel (October 1, 1975, p. 1754), I felt certain that LJ readers would be pleased to note the cooperative spirit of El Paso City government not only in retaining last year's CETA-Title II allocation to the El Paso Public Library but also in increasing that allocation during the new fiscal year.

As noted in the March 15, 1975 LJ (p. 544), EPPL enjoyed an initial allocation of 11 positions increased during the last fiscal year to 12 valued at $67,779.00 in annual salaries. Last month the City's Office of Manpower Planning and Personnel Department added three and a half positions to increase the annual salary valuation to $86,231.50 for a total of fourteen and a half positions. New positions include one Clerk II and one Bookmobile Operator for EPPL's new mediamobile and one and a half FTE Guards for the Main Library. Further, during the last year, the city generously permitted the Library Department to reclassify several of the original 12 CETA positions. In the process, EPPL traded two positions for one resulting in the following allocation: one Bookmobile Operator, one Secretary I, two Library Pages, one Graphic Artist, one Assistant Graphic Artist, one Printing Equipment Operator I, one Messenger, and three Library Outreach Workers. In addition, the Library Department continues to participate in the SER/CETA-Title I Program.

South Florida answers alumni

Alice G. Smith
Professor and Past Director, College of Education, University of South Florida, Tampa:

As the recent past director of the newly accredited Library Science Program at the University of South Florida, Tampa, I would like to express my shock and sadness at LJ's October 1, 1975 report (p. 1762) based on a letter written by the president of our Library Science Alumni Association. There have definitely been a great many misunderstandings of actual fact.

There has been no lapse in directorship. I maintained my position, and worked at it, until September 15, 1975. (I am now on sabbatical and will return to teaching January 2, 1976.) On that day Jean Key Gates assumed the ad interim directorship. A notice of this was sent to all library schools.

The search for a new director has never been put off. During the San Francisco ALA Conference, Jean Gates and I interviewed over 15 interested applicants.

Between the San Francisco Conference and September 15, I received and replied to each applicant (including many new ones not received in San Francisco). My reply stated that with the beginning of the new quarter (September 22, 1975) a new search committee would be formed and the applicants would be notified of that fact and of the appointment of a new chairman for the search committee. That chairman is Dr. John Knego.

I think it is hardly necessary to state that the administration at the University of South Florida has been cooperative with and interested in the accreditation of the library school. The accreditation committee was fully aware of the experimental organization in the College of Education and did not appear to feel that any autonomy was threatened or breached. The experimental phase has been completed and that structure has been voted down by the faculty. All of this happened before the Morse letter was written. Before the experimental year we were a department; we became a program; we are again a department. We are not a College.

It is most unfortunate that someone from the small segment of the alumni that the Morse letter represents did not get in touch with me, the director, to ask about the status quo.

Uncle Sam and the public library

There is very real danger that the experience of 20 years of highly successful federal aid to public libraries will go down the drain this year, when both our legislators and everyone concerned with libraries should rather be busy devising legislation for the further evolution of the Library Services and Construction Act. Any day now, warns the ALA Washington Office, we may be faced with a Ford veto of the extension of LSCA, and we will need every one of the numerous friends of libraries in Congress to overturn the expected Presidential vandalism.

LSCA is in double jeopardy; normally, a program which runs ot of time gets an automatic one-year extension—unless it is clear that Congress doesn't want to extend it at all. Right now, following the recent change in the fiscal year, there are a great many programs, including LSCA, which need to be supplied with transitional funding to carry them over from the old fiscal year end (June 30) to the September 1 start of the new one. LSCA has been left off that list by the administration, and so far library friends have not been able to get it back on. Should the push for a five-year extension fail, June 30 would be the end of the Library Services and Construction Act.

The LSCA extension is going before Congress with an impressive list of Congressional sponsors from both sides of the aisle, bearing out Congressman Brademas's growl that "the White House had better get the message; this is not a political thing, it's a bipartisan thing." Brademas spoke in rebuke of a spokesman from the Office of Education passing on the administration dictum that the federal government has no business funding libraries. LSCA extension must win heavily in Congress, by a margin which will promise defeat of the expected Ford veto.

As everyone concerned with the fate of LSCA agrees, this is only a holding action, trying to keep the ball game alive while the worst enemy of libraries ever to occupy the White House is in a position to damage them. We should be—and maybe after November we will be seriously discussing the new LSCA as well as a whole new generation of national library legislation.

In discussions with Al Trezza of the National Commission on Libraries and Information Science, with Sara Case of the ALA Washington Office, with Joseph Shubert of the ad hoc ALA committee on the revision of LSCA, with ALA President Allie Beth Martin, there seemed to emerge a hope that the new LSCA will concern itself more than the old one with library service at the user level, although this will not be achieved by federal money being passed out to all the local libraries of the land.

The new LSCA, everyone seems to agree, will have to find ways to use its federal money muscles to stimulate the states (and also the local governments) to increase their support for the delivery of library service.

The special case of the foundering urban libraries is being addressed also. While a vigorous group of urban library leaders is pushing for direct aid to keep their libraries from going down in the present financial crisis, the rest of the library leadership, hostile at first to this drive, seems to be finding an accommodation. Agreement seems to have been reached that the extended LSCA should give considerably more of its Title I funds (for library programs and service) to the urban libraries.

There is philosophical distaste among library leaders for the use of federal funds to support local library institutions; but the people responsible for keeping these many libraries, great and small, from extinction feel no such distaste, and if the next round of library legislation doesn't promise them some aid in keeping books on the shelves and the library doors open, there is going to be a vast lack of support for new library legislation. People write their Congressmen and Congressmen vote for library aid in the belief that it means books are being bought and librarians are being provided. If the new LSCA doesn't clearly address itself to the individual library user—as well as to all the organizational development necessary for the higher levels of resource acquisition and sharing—there will be no popular support and that could be still a third way that LSCA could end.

If it seems likely that a federally-funded initiative will build on the multitude of lessons learned in the last 20 years of the Library Services and Construction Act and create or modify our institutions of service delivery to serve us rather than expend our resources in propping up bureaucracies and buildings, that popular support will surely appear. Our institutions—too many of them—are as antiquated as is much of our industrial plant; yet we cannot let go of them, or support what seems to be development irrelevant to them, unless there is a clear-cut promise of alleviation of our individual deprivation and denial of access to the mainstream of our culture.

The State Publications Program

Now any library can conveniently and economically access and retrieve official state publications.

With the assistance of documents librarians, collecting libraries, and state document resource-centers, Information Handling Services has begun compiling truly comprehensive printed checklists of current publications from all 50 states, Puerto Rico, and the Virgin Islands. These bibliographically sound checklists will include virtually all official publications issued by every state agency and department. (Please note: this program does not include statutes, court-reports, and some non-official reports.) The printed 1976 issue of current State Publications Checklists will include the years 1973-1975.

To complement these current checklists, IHS will make available microfiche of selected current, regular and irregular state publications, in such subjects as agriculture, labor and employment, taxation, revenue and budgets, transportation, law enforcement, and health care. These publications will be further enhanced by critically important legislative documents, including committee and commission reports and legislative council publications.

The program will begin with state publications for 1973, moving forward as original material is acquired for filming. The complete first file will include approximately 2,000 separate publications (200,000 pages) on 2,000 standard fiche. It may be expanded to accommodate expressed needs.

The logical second stage in the IHS State Publications Program will be the creation and publication of retrospective checklists of official serial reports of major administrative agencies for every state and territory. The checklists will be followed by micropublication of selected retrospective serial reports—a combination providing invaluable access to the entire history of state administrative activity.

1976 Printed Checklist of State Publications (Covering 1973-1975) $50.00

Current Select State Publications (Complete File, $1.17 per fiche) $2,340.00

Current Select State Publications (By state or subject) .....$1.25 per fiche

Individual Publications .....$1.50 per fiche

(Minimum Order, $50)

Current Checklists and State Publications are tentatively scheduled for publication in June, 1976.

The State Publications Program should prove to be the most thorough, convenient, and low-cost method of providing these valuable documents to researchers, scholars, and the legal profession. To make it fully responsive to your library's need, Information Handling Services would like to hear your comments and suggestions; just clip and mail this coupon.

NCLIS calls for LSCA revision: more $$, safeguards

The National Commission on Libraries and Information Science has drastically revamped its position on federal funding: it now wants the Library Services and Construction Act revised, extended for at least three more years, and new provisions for forward funding, safeguards against the substitution of federal funds for state funds, and a strengthening of LSCA Title III (interlibrary cooperation). In a strongly worded resolution, NCLIS recommended "that the funding level for fiscal year 1977 for LSCA, Title I (services and programs) be at a level not less than the FY 1976 appropriation; Title II (construction) at a minimum level of $9 million; Title III (cooperation), including the Library Partnership Act, at a minimum level of $15 million; and Title IV, Older American Services, at a minimum level of $2 million."

NCLIS also urged Congress and the President to carry out "a re-examination of the authorized level of funding and the national priorities" specified in LSCA and of the requirements for effective long-range planning.

NCLIS came out with specific recommendations for revising LSCA that included:

- "Ensure that federal funds will not be substituted for state funds nor used as a substitute for adequate state support for the function of the state library agency. Put a limitation of ten percent on state library agency expenditures for administrative purposes."
- Allow LSCA, Title I funds to be "matched by state appropriations only."
- Impose a "statutory time limitation on the use of LSCA funds for the state administration of LSCA, ensuring that more LSCA funds are distributed to eligible libraries."
- Get more LSCA Title I funds out to urban public libraries.
- Restructure the administrative and fiscal provisions of LSCA "to strengthen, stimulate, and require state and local support."
- Merge Title III of LSCA and the multitype Library Partnership Act "providing for the establishment of a local-state-federal partnership program for the purpose of encouraging and sustaining an adequate system of libraries and for the further development of networks which extend and expand the use of the resources of school, public, academic, special libraries, and information centers."
- Revise LSCA to include provisions for forward funding "to help resolve the recurring problems of uncertainty, late allocations, and other administrative problems which interfere with effective planning at the national, state, and local level."

In presenting its recommendations, NCLIS noted that its new bid for stronger federal library support was prompted by evidence of inadequate funding—gathered at its series of regional hearings. Other library groups have been pushing for more federal aid: the Chief Officers of State Library Agencies (COSLA) was was one that urged Congress to "take early action on extension of the Federal Library Services and Construction Act." The Urban Libraries Council was another to speak out; it focused on the financial plight of both academic and public urban libraries. ULC wants the states and the federal government both to provide direct aid to libraries, with funding for state agencies kept at a level needed for "developing communications systems and interlibrary flow or information." NCLIS wants state library agencies to play a strong role in national network development, and its recommendation that less LSCA money be used for library agency administrative expenses could be interpreted as a move to prod states into providing adequate funding for agencies.

NCLIS charts progress on its national program

The National Commission on Libraries and Information Science has issued a statement clocking its progress in getting its national library program going. In "Steps toward Implementation of the National Program," NCLIS ticked off the latest in its long series of studies: one on the role of the Library of Congress in the national network and another on the National Inventory of Library and Information Service Needs.

Other studies cited: an evaluation of the effectiveness of federal funding for public libraries—including categorical grant aid, Revenue Sharing, and the proposed Library Partnership Act; a copyright study aimed at determining the extent of library photocopying and the "probable administrative cost of a transaction-based royalty payment scheme." NCLIS also intends to appoint a task force, with members from the public and private sector, "to formulate guidelines and programs to actively involve the private sector in the implementation of the national program."

As for resource sharing, NCLIS reports that two task forces (one with responsibility for periodicals and the other with monographic and other serial resources) are checking into the possiblity of designating national and/or regional bibliographic resource centers that would provide services similar to those of England's National Lending Library.

Stressing anew the importance of the White House Conference on Library and Information Science, NCLIS urged the President to act, getting the Conference going "no later than 1978"; to appoint 15 members to the Advisory Committee to the White House Conference; and to request from Congress a $3.5 million appropriation.

Summing up, NCLIS stated its intention to "move boldly, forcefully, with confidence and dispatch" in identifying problems and setting forth "recommendations for action that may require new legislation, revision of current laws, broadening of the responsibilities of existing agencies, etc."

Takeover of LC Madison bldg. dropped by House leaders

Faced with growing resistance to its proposal from the rest of Congress, the House leadership has abandoned its attempt to claim for office space a substantial portion of the new Madison annex to the Library of Congress. The leaders met in the office of House Speaker Carl Albert (D.-Oklahoma) to work out a compromise arrangement under which a small portion (from six to seven percent) of the library building would be used temporarily to house Congressional staff personnel who are engaged primarily in research. But there's reportedly stiff opposition to guaranteeing a set amount of space.

Representative Lucien N. Nedzi (D.-Michigan), who was a leading opponent of the takeover, has said that House leaders would seek an appropriation of $30 million to complete the Madison facility; its costs have exceeded the $90 million authorization. Completion of the building as a library is still expected to cost less than would its conversion to an office building and eventual construction of other library quarters.

Library lobbyists scored a major victory in drumming up opposition to the highjack; late in 1974 a majority of House members had signed a petition urging takeover of the building. At the last minute, the National Commission on Libraries and Information Science adopted a resolution urging Congress to drop its plans to occupy the new facility and appropriate enough money to finish it.

Connecticut State Library plans more service to schools

Charles Funk, newly appointed State Librarian of Connecticut, has indicated in the first newsletter issued by his administration (The Provisioner, Volume I, No. 1) a renewed State Library interest in providing library service to public schools as well as local public libraries.

State law, he pointed out, provides that "the State Library Board may establish and maintain library service centers to provide supplementary books and related library materials and services to public libraries and to public schools. It is my intention, during my administration as state librarian, to extend as much service to all of Connecticut's libraries and residents as is at all possible, considering the combined factors of budget, personnel, and legislative mandate."

At a time when state library agencies across the nation are jockeying for positions of leadership in the coming decade of the library development which is expected to accompany national network planning, Connecticut State Library is one of the few which do not have to cope with strong potential rivals for funding and authority such as the public library systems and the newer multitype consortia found in many states. Funk's statement suggests a potential for a pioneering venture by the Connecticut State Library, which has already, despite a severely limited financial base, taken statewide action with a statewide borrowing card, a film service, and a telephone reference service.

The title of the state library's new newsletter, Funk points out, makes a Bicentennial nod toward the earliest nickname for Connecticut—the "Provision State," so named because of Washington's dependence on it during the Revolution for supplies for the army.

Theater in libraries: programs at Toronto and San Francisco

A new research program in Canadian theater history has been launched at the University of Toronto Robards Library, reports the Toronto Globe and Mail. Involved in the project are Dean of Library Science Frances Halpenny and Metro Toronto Central Library staffer Heather McCallum, along with faculty members from several departments and colleges in the university.

Aiming at countering a lack of primary research materials in the field, the program will work to "organize research guides and basic materials for work in Canadian theater history and to develop a cross-country network of histories of Canadian theater." Funding for the first year to the tune of $60,000 has been put up by the Connaught Fund, which was formed in 1972 when the university sold the assets of the Connaught Laboratory to the Canadian Development Corporation.

The San Francisco Public Library has a new Dance Archives in its Presidio Branch Library. Exhibits reflect the history of ballet in San Francisco, going back to the first resident ballet troupe, Llorentes and Arroyos, in the 1850's, through the two year stay of the La Scala Ballet and the 1922 founding of the San Francisco Ballet Company.

Indiana's state film service expanding in 1976

The Indiana Library Film Service Authority, reports one of its clients, the Vigo County Public Library of Terre Haute, will expand its list of libraries served and its services to them in the coming year. Budgetary weakness had bogged down the Authority's plans to distribute a monthly 20-title film package to each of its members.

Three-year-old N.J. censure lifted by NJLA

The Clifton Public Library in New Jersey is no longer under censure by the New Jersey Library Association for "unsatisfactory conditions of intellectual freedom" in 1973 and for "violations of generally recognized principles of personnel practices" in October 1974.

At the October 1975 meeting of NJLA, a letter from Clifton Director Salvatore Stingo requested lifting of the censure, and the association's grievance committee noted that the permanent appointment of Stingo as director in Clifton indicated that the "Board of Trustees has committed itself to current practices" and concluded that the "violations of intellectual freedom and personnel practices . . . do not now exist." A voice vote lifted the censure without discussion.

THE LIBRARY DOLLAR

Library budget sunshine: gifts, book $$, lobbying

New York Public Library got a giant Astor gift; one Michigan library system upped its book budget by 25 percent; and Comprehensive Training and Employment Act funding is helping some libraries pay salaries. Two Mid-Hudson, New York libraries managed to win restoration of their subsidies thanks to impressive lobbying efforts. Reports of budget sunshine to come to LJ include:

• Good news from down under: The Australian tabloid Library News reports that public libraries in Victoria will get a funding boost from $5.2 million to $7.6 million—a 46 percent increase over the 1974-75 budget for total spending on municipally supported libraries, and the fruit of a state commitment to match local dollars on a two-to-one per capita basis. Funding has also been announced for Technilib, a central processing facility planned to serve libraries throughout the state.

• $1 million for NYPL: The Vincent Astor Foundation has awarded a $1 million gift to the New York Public Library for "unrestricted capital support" for salaries and library programs.

• $$ for Monroe, Michigan books: The Monroe County Library System reports a 25 percent boost in book buying next year, going from $120,000 to $150,000.

• More CETA for Rochester: New York's Rochester Public Library reports that Comprehensive Employment and Training Act funding will pay the salaries of two new library assistants. The staff additions will enable it to activate three extra telephone lines in its Information Services Division and help restore branch service hours.

• Mid-Hudson lobbying efforts pay off: The Mid-Hudson Library System Newsletter reports that two system member libraries have succeeded in getting their New York communities to restore library subsidies that were to have been cut off. The Putnam Valley Free Library (which serves a portion of the town of Cortlandt) was faced with the loss of its subsidy from the Cortlandt Town Board—a decision that was reversed when librarians and residents put the heat on local government. The Kent Free Public Library faced a loss of contractual funds from the town of Kent for library service for 1976, but once again citizens complained bitterly at town budget hearings, getting the town to restore $15,000 of the $23,000 regular subsidy.

• Va. Library parking meters out: The Arlington County Board voted to remove almost all of the recently installed parking meters at the county's main public library. Only one of the four voting board members opposed the action, saying the library should use its own funds to cover any revenue shortage resulting from the meter removal. The parking meters, which were installed in September, had been a hotly debated subject: hundreds of citizens complaining to the board that the 20-cent-per-hour cost of parking discriminates against older residents and students as well. The board insisted on installing them as a means of recovering part of the cost of providing free library service: the meters, which cost $12,000 for installation alone, were expected to raise $22,000 a year.

You say your students think World War II is ancient history?

• Indiana's No. 1 fundraiser: Indiana University's basketball coach Robert Knight is spearheading a fund-raising campaign aimed at helping IU's libraries dig out: copies of a booklet by him (What's #1 in My Book) went out to some 150,000 alumni, plus faculty members and library staffers. It details the library budget crisis and asks for donations. The Indiana University Foundation is paying for the fund-raising drive—including mailing costs and records of donations. The Foundation also paid for an entire year's run of full-page advertisements in home-game basketball programs. Knight also starred in a half-time TV program on the library; it was broadcast during the Kentucky game at Louisville.

Layoffs & service cuts hit Jersey & N.Y. libraries

Libraries of all types are feeling the budget squeeze: Trenton State College fired more than half its staff; New York Public Library's Research Libraries are cutting back service hours again; and the American Geographical Society might have to close its New York library. Among the reports of budget disaster to come to LJ in early 1976:

• NYPL Research Libraries cut hours: The economy squeeze has forced another cutback in service hours at New York Public Library's Research Libraries: down from 60 to 43 hours a week. The facilities are closed on Thursdays and Sundays; until 1970 they had been running on a 87-hour seek, open Sundays, holidays, and evenings. Restoration of service is promised if the budget situation improves.

• Trenton State bloodbath: A 50 percent cutback in Trenton State College's book budget is blamed for the decision to send out blanket notices of nonretention affecting 14 of its 21 librarians. When the librarians (some of them having more than nine years of service to their credit) go, Trenton State will have to curtail or eliminate programs, services, and weekend and evening hours. New Jersey librarians, it was pointed out, failed in their attempt to get the courts to restore their faculty status, which was removed in 1970 by state government.

• American Geographic cutbacks: The American Geographical Society, reports the New York Times, is considering such budget surgery measures as: closing its New York library and cutting service to "by appointment only" for access to its collections of 180,000 books, 336,000 loose maps, and 5000 atlases; abandoning its publication Current Geographical Publications; and laying off seven of its eight staffers.

• Cutbacks in Poughkeepsie: New York's Adrianance Memorial Library (the central reference library and largest member of the Mid-Hudson Library System) plans to cut services to Poughkeepsie residents because of the city's failure to boost its support. Director James Brock reported that the city's preliminary budget gives the library only $183,648—slightly less than last year's budget of $184,495. County support, he noted, could also go down. Brock predicted that the library would have to slash service hours, lay off some personnel, and reduce further its book budget already cut by more than half of last year's total. Meanwhile, book circulation is up 20 percent this year.

Main libraries in small cities eligible for CDA funding

Responding to criticism from ALA, the Department of Housing and Urban Development (HUD) last year clarified the language of the Community Development Act—making urban neighborhood library branches clearly eligible for CDA grants for construction projects. Now HUD says that even a main library can be eligible—if its location makes it an integral part of the community involved.

The Lewis and Clark Library System of Illinois sent LJ an excerpt of HUD's new position: "After a careful review of the matter, we concluded that neighborhood libraries could qualify as neighborhood facilities. However, in small communities, the whole city may constitute a single neighborhood. We therefore concluded that a central library in communities under 10,000 serves, as a practical matter, as a neighborhood library and would be eligible for assistance."

This new interpretation of CDA eligibility could open up to many small public libraries a new source of federal aid—which in most states was not available under Title II of LSCA.

Federal aid to libraries: HEA & LSCA prospects

Recent reports from Washington indicate that both HEA (Higher Education Act) and LSCA (Library Services and Construction Act) funding will probably stay at the 1974 level. A new legislative bill (S 2657) calls for renewal of HEA at present funding levels through 1982: the current authorization allows $70 million for books and other materials; $30 million for research and demonstration projects; and $9 million for the National Program for Acquisition and Cataloging (NPAC) of foreign materials. President Ford, incidentally, is still trying for a cutback of last year's education funding

As for LSCA, if Congress fails to go for a renewal before the program expires at the close of fiscal 1976 (September 30) it would be automatically extended (at the 1974 funding level) for one more year. Such library organizations as ALA, the National Commission on Libraries and Information Science, and the Office of Education's library bureau, have not yet asked for any substantial changes in LSCA, but the Urban Libraries Council has appealed for changes that would provide public libraries with $400 million annually for operating expenses

Urban Libraries Council makes new $$ appeal

At a meeting of the Urban Libraries Council held recently in Park Rapids, Minnesota, representatives of both academic and public urban libraries issued a joint statement pointing to the plight of their financially pressed institutions. In an appeal to Congress they asked for: direct assistance to every public and academic library; particular assistance to key library resources at strategic locations in all parts of the nation; and support for interlibrary communications systems and resource sharing projects.

While stressing the importance of halting all efforts to cut federal aid to libraries, ULC came up with specific aid proposals. Among them: that government set a target of aid to public and academic libraries equal to 20 percent of their operating costs; that it "establish incentives that will increase the share of our collective wealth that is assigned to support library and information services by 100 percent within the next decade"; and that federal aid be distributed to state agencies in proportion to population and taking geographical factors into consideration, while requiring that the states pass out aid to communities on the same basis.

Also recommended: that the federal government make states give direct aid to libraries and keep at the state agency level only funds needed for developing "communications systems and interlibrary flow of information"; that states give libraries double the aid given by the federal government; and that there be no abridgement of local control.

The conferees made their appeal in the context of a national library crisis, not confined to any single type of library and not capable of being resolved by local effort. The statement was issued by Ervin Gaines, director of the Cleveland Public Library, and Melvin R. George, director of the library at Northeastern Illinois University.

$$ for Mass. information centers

Word of a funding opportunity for libraries comes from the Revere Public Library (Massachusetts), which reports that a $40,000 Community Development Block Grant (part of the Housing and Community Development Act of 1974, P.L. 93-383) will pay for one or more neighborhood library and information centers. The prospective branches, says Revere, will meet the needs of a segment of the Revere community currently receiving limited or inadequate library service; each will be a multimedia center. Target date for the opening of the first center is June 30, 1976.

LAD committee studies fines

The Circulation Services Section of ALA's Library Administration Division has formed an ad hoc Fines and Penalties Committee. Its goal: to draw up guidelines on the use of fines, penalties, and other punitive actions by libraries concerned about abuses in the circulation of materials. The Committee plans several sessions at ALA-Midwinter and wants input on fines and other penalties. Such information, including news of any studies on the topic, should be sent to Committee Chairperson Thomas Alford, Director, Macomb County Library, 21930 Dunham Rd., Mt. Clemens, Minn. 48043.

California debates new state plan; system role in doubt

In the latest stage of intensive statewide planning for a new approach to state-funded library network activities, California librarians now have before them the outlines of new legislation, as developed for the recent California Library Association meeting by its Governmental Relations Committee. Ratification of the plan in its present form was, however, withheld by CLA members on the grounds of insufficient time for discussion of the latest version and serious doubts on some issues. The text of the legislative proposal is available in the December issue of the Newsletter of CLA.

The proposal itself was developed subsequent to the often heated discussion at the June 23-27 Library Planning Institute in Sacramento, proceedings of which are now available with a verbatim record of the discussions. The LPI had been convened for discussion of the Peat, Marwick, Mitchell study California Public Library Systems; a Comprehensive Review with Guidelines for the Next Decade (summarized in LJ, November 15, p. 2115-16).

A reading of the Proceedings of the LPI reveals vocal opposition to what many public library system and local library directors see as a strong bias in the Peat, Marwick report toward a state plan that would weaken and possibly even supersede the systems and local public libraries as recipients of state funding and consequently as loci of decision making. The course of development clearly favored by PMM would have channelled an additional $3 million in state aid into support for a few large libraries designated to handle interloan and interlibrary reference for the state, and into a modest program of library development and staff development activities by the State Library. Critics saw an unhealthy tendency toward too much centralization, and toward exaggerated concern for the specialized user of research materials. And, indeed, the developing California plan was compared to the plan of the National Commission on Libraries and Information Science (and the criticisms it has received) by NCLIS member Julia Li Wu.

The report laid before the California Library Association on December 1 took still further steps toward the language of the new legislation which backers hope to take to the legislature early this year. But among the proposals that CLA members felt needed more thought were: payment to libraries for interloan ($5.21 per transaction) and for interlibrary reference ($14.25 per transaction) would be on a "net" basis—a library could collect only if it gave more than it received in these services. (This would cut off a promising source of new income to all but a few libraries.) The 20 present public library systems would be enlarged by the addition of libraries of other types, and the membership of governing bodies would reflect not only this but the addition of members of the public.

Other debatable points: an online computerized data base would not substitute for the many and varied union catalogs now in operation, but would be limited to new acquisitions, on the grounds that most materials requested on interloan are recent. The Sustaining Services Fund to be doled out by the

especially designed for LIBRARIES

State Library could provide subgrants to the library systems (which are very chary of the whole thing to date) for staff development and to individual public libraries for library development. Library users in profit-making organizations would be as eligible as public library users to state supported loan and reference services. Systems would no longer be able to spend their state support as they see fit for local needs, but would have to provide specific services mandated in the state plan. Delivery services would switch from system or library owned vehicles to commercial services such as Greyhound or United Parcel Service where the latter proved to be cheaper.

Present plans call for asking the legislature, in effect, to increase its present $1 million state aid to libraries by an additional $3 million. For this the state gets a more efficient, more economical statewide interloan and interlibrary reference service, plus the upgrading of library personnel, resources, and services through programs directed by the state library. Not included in the proposed new legislation is the now-forming California Library Authority for Systems and Services (CLASS), a nonprofit but fee-supported supra-library organization which will coordinate and provide high level network services to all the state's libraries and their publics.

Pittsburgh Library Center voices concern over OCLC pace

The Pittsburgh Regional Library Center, a member of the Ohio College Library Center (OCLC) network, reports concern over the "lack of progress at OCLC in adding the PRLC Serials Data Base into the computers." It was noted that the PRLC data base had been sent to the Ohio College Library Center "many months ago." The PRLC November/December Newsletter reporting this concern noted also a desire to find some means of terminal maintenance at a cost less than that charged by OCLC, and discussed the possibility of extending service to West Virginia libraries as one way to offset costs.

BALLOTS in Mid-Mississippi; initial successes reported

The Mid-Mississippi Regional Library, headquartered in Kosciusko and serving some 77,000 persons, has chosen the Stanford, California BALLOTS system as its source of automated bibliographic information. BALLOTS (Bibliographic Automation of Large Library Operations Using a Time-Sharing System) was chosen by Mid-Mississippi over the Ohio College Library System (OCLC), SOLINET (which is a regional distributor of OCLC), and BIBNET for several reasons, explains MMLS's new newsletter, the Regional Library Review:

"1) No binding contract; 2) no membership fee; 3) the need to only search and not catalog on-line; 4) the absence of any obligations other than to pay as you use the system and a low rate of $16 to $22 per actual hour of use (the system will search 60 to 80 titles per hour); 5) no programming or maintenance fee required; and 6) no use charges per item searched."

In operation since October 6, BALLOTS is credited already with easing a processing backlog by substituting for The Book Publishing Record and The Weekly Record, with best results from searching by LC card number.

Statewide periodicals database planned for Wisconsin libraries

The Council of Wisconsin Librarians has launched planning for a statewide data base of serial holdings; a committee chaired by Joseph A. Boissé, director of libraries, University of Wisconsin-Parkside, has been named. A projected six-year effort is set for the development of a data base which will include the holdings of all libraries in the state that agree to share their resources either by interloan or for on-site use.

The new database will aid the operations of WILS, the Wisconsin Interlibrary Loan and, if possible, tie in with the international CONSER (Conversion of Serials) effort to create a database of all US and Canadian serials holdings.

PALINET and Union Catalogue effect formal merger

One of the oldest and one of the newest library cooperatives have accomplished a formal merger. The Union Library Catalogue of Pennsylvania (established in 1936) has merged with the Pennsylvania Area Library Network (PALINET) which it set up in 1972. The new corporation will provide the 165 members of PALINET with automated sharing of library information resources. It will use the OCLC (Ohio College Library Center) system as a source of current locations for titles in the Union Catalogue file and also will produce a microfilm edition of the U.C.

Robert C. Stewart is now executive director of PALINET/ULC, with Eleanor Campion director of the Union Library Catalogue. A 13 member board includes as President Keith Doms (Free Library of Philadelphia); Vice President Richard De Gennaro (University of Pennsylvania); Secretary Patricia Ann Sacks (Cedar Crest and Muhlenberg Colleges) and Treasurer Arthur Hamlin (Temple).

PERSONNEL

University of Toronto strike over; staff wins 18.1 percent boost

The clerical and technical staffs of the University of Toronto Libraries have won pay raises ranging from ten to 18 percent subject, however, to approval by the Anti-Inflation Board, whose guidelines allow for only eight to 12 percent raises. The increase is weighted to achieve one union aim—more for employees at the lower end of the income scale. Personnel in higher classifications will get increases of 10.5 to 11.5 percent; the increase at the median range is 18 percent. CUPE had rejected the university's original offer of a 15 percent across the board increase.

The strike committee of the Canadian Union of Public Employees (CUPE) had opposed the settlement in the third week of the strike on the grounds that it wouldn't bring pay rates up to the levels found at the Metropolitan Toronto Library and that it failed to provide job security against budget cutbacks which could eliminate 80 jobs in the coming year.

Defending the university against an editorial charging "elitism" in the university's cutbacks of lower level personnel instead of in its administrative and faculty salaries, President John R. Evans protested that cutbacks had been consistently directed at removing positions rather than people; that the faculty was teaching a student body 20 percent larger than in 1971-72 with no increase in teaching staff; and that the 5.3 percent of income spent on administration compares favorably with the 7.7 percent figure held for other Ontario Universities.

The three-week strike by CUPE members successfully shut down the library, but it failed to draw substantial support from either students or professional staff; students were reported to have responded to the strike threat by rushing to check out library materials needed for year-end study during the strike.

LAPL union will fight five staff transfers

The Communicator, publication of the Librarians' Guild, AFSCME union local of the Los Angeles Public Library professional staff, announces that it will launch a fight against the transfer of five regional librarians to new posts.

In a formal request for arbitration, the union suggested that the transfers were in retaliation for union activity, and constituted material changes in working conditions. A group of 15 principal librarians signed a statement of support for the five regional librarians.

At issue, says the Communicator, is the right of management to make "administrative transfers" without prior consultation and consent of the staff involved, despite assertions by Director Wyman Jones that the transfers were made both for the good of the library and in the best interests of the individuals involved.

Librarians share 14 percent raise at Ottawa university

Librarians at Carleton University in Ottawa—members of the University Academic Staff Association—will share in an average 14.2 percent salary increase won by the new collective bargaining agency in its first negotiation since its certification in June.

Under the contract, minimum salaries for librarians were set at $12,000, with a lump sum payment of $750 to all teaching and library staff covered by the agreement, reports the Toronto Globe and Mail.

"Biased" ALA accreditation decried by Calif. Chicanos

In a letter the Oxnard, California, Public Library board, Octavio Sifuentes of La Raza Faculty Association of the California Community Colleges has called the library to task for turning down two Mexican-American job applicants because they graduated from a university (California State University, Fullerton) not yet accredited by the American Library Association. ALA's accreditation policy, asserted Sifuentes, is holding Chicano librarians back, and library schools that do have accreditation are not providing them with adequate educational opportunity. One case in point: La Raza's Committee to Recruit Mexican-American Librarians failed to get any accredited library school to run an institute to train Mexican-Americans in librarianship.

Sifuentes charged that the Oxnard Library, which does not have on its staff a Spanish-speaking professional, is providing "marginal" service to the Mexican-American community, which makes up some 35 percent of the city's population. He argued that Oxnard should give due consideration to graduates of California State University, which has won accreditation from the state. The Ventura Community College District, he noted, has waived ALA accreditation as a standard and hired four librarians to its teaching staff.

ALA library education survey charts discrimination progress

Findings of the latest survey conducted by ALA's Office of Library Personnel Resources indicate that 80.5 percent of the recipients of degrees and certificates from programs in library education in 1973-4 were women, (a slight decrease from the 81.7 percent for 1974 for all librarians reported by the Monthly Labor Review) but men got 63.8 percent of the doctorates. Minorities still fared poorly in gaining doctorates, but for all ethnic groups 50 percent or more of all doctoral grads were men. Women graduates were the majority in the four minority groups identified.

Whites still dominated with 89.2 percent of all graduates, followed by blacks, 5.7 percent; Asian-Americans, 2 percent; Spanish surnamed, 1.3 percent, and American Indians, 0.1 percent.

Accredited programs clearly dominate the field: ALA found 6,323 new grads from its accredited programs and only 898 from non-accredited programs. And it found that minority students do not graduate in larger numbers from the non-accedited schools: the score for them was 524 from accredited against 141 from nonaccredited, so that the majority (73 percent) of minority grads come from the accredited schools. However, the data show that over 15 percent of the non-accredited grads are minority group members.

Compared to other academic fields, however, library science clocked a small lead over the averages in its percent of Asian-American and black grads—1.2 percent and 0.2 percent respectively, but lower for Spanish surnamed and American Indians.

The ALA Office for Library Personnel Resources reports that it plans to survey sexual and ethnic composition of library staffs by job and salary levels.

PROGRAMS

Library programming: women, ski clinic, driving

Libraries are reported this month trying to get to various segments of the community with such programs as a month long Celebration of Women, a ski clinic, training in sign language, and defensive driving sessions for senior citizens.

• Women: January was the Celebration of Women's month at New York's Port Washington Public Library, with such programs as consciousness-raising mini-workshops; midcareer counseling; sessions on birth control, sexism in area schools, and human sexuality, plus films on the Lamaze method of childbirth. Port Washington's programming also included: breast cancer screening, workshops on physical fitness and yoga, craft demonstrations, a communitywide volunteer fair (organizations presented literature, slides, and films on volunteerism); painting and photography exhibits, and dance, drama, and music performances by area women. Libraries interested in running similar programming can get copies of the January Port Washington calendar from Virginia Parker, 245 Main St., Port Washington, N.Y. 11050.

• Childbirth and rape: Indiana's Lake County Public Library is running prepared childbirth classes and programs on rape (the latter are cosponsored by the Calumet Women United Against Rape).

• Ski clinic: The Gerrish-Higgins School District Public Library (Roscommon, Michigan) recently held a cross country ski clinic; patrons tried out new techniques learned in the library's parking lot.

• Beer cans: About 200 adults and youngsters flocked to Indiana's Lake County Public Library for a program on beer can collecting.

• Sign language: Indiana's Lake County Public Library plans a series of sign language classes aimed at helping Griffith residents learn to communicate with the deaf and hard-of-hearing.

• Defensive driving: Defensive Driving Classes for Senior Citizens are to be held at the Hobart community library of Indiana's Lake County Public Library system. The classes are cosponsored by the American Association of Retired the first step is yours.

Creating a library bound book is not an easy job. It's an involved process consisting of 41 different steps . . . each designed to provide the finished volume with the strongest, longest-lasting binding possible.

But the first, most important step must be taken by you, the librarian. You must insist upon having the books and periodicals in your collection bound in accordance with the LBI Standard.

If you want to increase the usefulness of your collection, yet keep costs to a minimum, take that first step today. Send for free brochures on the advantages of library binding and contact a library binder who displays the LBI seal.

Backpedalling to a YA shelf: the Warwick, R.I. "Bike Rack"

A report in the November issue of the lively Rhode Island Library Association RILA Bulletin describes a novel version of the old "young adult" or "teen" shelf which has vanished from many libraries, partly because of youthful disdain for both the books and the teen image of yesteryear.

Warwick, reports Acquisition Librarian Carol Swanson, is filling the need that still exists for reading materials that address the interests of the young adult with an unobtrusive paperback section stocked with fiction and nonfiction targeted on such youthful concerns as "search for identity, problems of alienation and rebellion, the generation gap, formation of values, and determination of goals." Most titles are not duplicated on other library paperback racks, she notes.

And, there is no sign branding the collection as "young adult" or "teenage" or "YA"—only an unobtrusive stamped drawing of an old fashioned high wheeled vehicle on each book to aid in shelving. Thus, neither young adults nor even adults are steered away, and the "Bike Rack" as the collection has come to be called, has enjoyed heavy use ever since its creation and stocking with 500 paperbacks last summer, says Ms. Swanson.

Health info programming in N.Y., Washington, & Boston

Scattered reports to come to LJ indicate that public libraries are responding to the need for getting information about medicine and health concerns to their communities. Among the stories reported:

• Publicizing medicine: In Nassau and Suffolk counties, New York, libraries and a hospital (Manhasset's North Shore University Hospital) have teamed up in an effort to publicize "the human side of today's medicine." The hospital developed a pictorial exhibit, and the libraries have booked it for a circuit of showings to be backed by exhibits of library materials on the subject.

• Health info hotline: A Washington organization called Spokane Health provides a library-like information service: a

The Clark County Library District (Las Vegas, Nevada) has received three new grants for library programs: the largest ($9,448 from the Nevada Humanities Committee) will pay for a documentary film series ("Nevada Issues") on medical malpractice and old age homes. The Library District will do the filming; the documentaries will highlight public hearings at the library and will later be broadcast on TV in both Vegas and Reno. Clark District also won small grants from the Nevada State Council on the Arts and the Western States Arts Foundation for an art exhibit open to Southern Nevada artists and performances in the library by Vermont's touring National Marionette Theatre.

Pop culture association meet

The sixth national meeting of the Popular Culture Association has been scheduled for April 22-24 at the Pick-Congress Hotel in Chicago. Among the conference features: a panel discussion on Libraries and Popular Culture for the airing of such topics as research, acquisitions, bibliographic control, and circulation. For more information, contact Jan Schroeder, Assistant Director, Duluth Public Library, Duluth, Minn. 55802.

Correction

The Salt Lake County Library System and not the Salt Lake Public Library is having trouble getting its Mail-A-Book service rolling, reports Yvonne Clement of SLCLS (LJ, September 15, p. 1596). Salt Lake County, she reports, is trying to get to people who could utilize the service: it has scheduled TV appearances as well as radio broadcasts to publicize the program. Says Clement, the library's efforts to attract outreach patrons is paying off: 20 phobic children (who are afraid of people and thus wouldn't get books otherwise) are among the latest patrons added to the mailbook service file.

AV materials by & for libraries

LJ has received a batch of reports on the availability of AV products of possible interest to libraries. Among them:

• Indiana University video distribution: Indiana University's Audio Visual Center now offers in any video format requested (color or B&W) all programs produced by the Indiana AV Center and by National Educational TV. To get a catalog, contact Diana Carl at the Indiana AV Center.

• LARITA's cassette interviews: The Lewis Audiovisual Research Institute and Teaching Archive, headquartered at the University of Arizona, has issued a new catalog listing its latest series of cassette interviews, including a Bicentennial section of relevant geographical and historic tapes as well as interviews with political, entertainment, and arts people. LARITA notes that schools can try for ESEA Title II grants to buy the tapes, which cost $7.95 each for the first copy and 70¢ each for duplicates. Contact: AV Services Building, University of Arizona, 1325 East Speedway Blvd., Tucson, Ariz. 85719.

• American Film Theatre: The first two years of film programming produced by the American Film Theatre are now available from RBC Films of 933 North La Brea Ave., Los Angeles, Calif. 90038, (213-874-5050). Rates are now being set for both one-time rental and long-term lease, says Timothy Clott of RBC; there will be a fee schedule for colleges (expected to be the heaviest borrowers), and another—a lower one—for public and school libraries.

• Film freebies: Association-Sterling Films of New York has a new catalog listing several hundred films (mostly 16mm color reels) available free to libraries. The films, sponsored by business, trade, professional, and government units, cover such topics as travel, sports, ecology, science and technology, business and finance, agriculture, and women's issues. ASF is at 866 Third Ave., New York, N.Y. 10022.

the great library ripoff

It goes on in all libraries. The over-zealous students, as well as those out to do malicious damage, decide to take a few pages out of your bound magazines. Your binding investment is cheapened. The vital research content is lessened and the volumes look a mess. Now that you are running your library, you have become increasingly cost conscious. You know that if time is money, space is money, too. You are becoming aware that binding is a losing proposition. That's why University Microfilms advocates putting your 1975 magazines on microform. Microform is so very, very efficient, and leaves little chance for a ripoff. In fact, the only thing you lose when you convert to microfilm are those rows and rows of bound periodicals. Now, if we could only think of something to do with all that freed space.

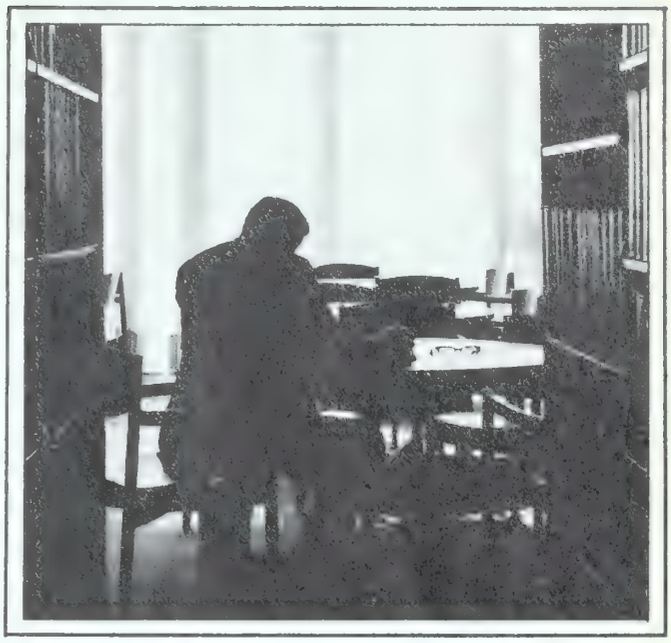
LIBRARIES and PRIVACY LEGISLATION



By Stephen Harter and Charles Busha

IN TODAY'S complex society, rational decision making and policy formation demand ever increasing amounts of accurate, pertinent, current information. Both in the public and private sectors, an extraordinary amount of data is required on which to base planning, in a comprehensive and rational way, for the provision of goods and services and for such pressing social needs as balanced ecological and economic systems, adequate crime control, education, national defense, and effective library and information systems. In addition, the proliferation of new services to citizens such as Social Security, Medicare, Unemployment Compensation, and other programs of social welfare implies a considerable government bureaucracy and an enormous volume of record-keeping. Much of this activity is concerned with gathering, storing, transmitting, and retrieving personal data on identifiable individual citizens. This characteristic has led one commentator to refer to our society as a "dossier society."[1]

Man has been a keeper of records since writing was first invented. What distinguishes today's dossier society from that of the Babylonian's is, first, that the volume of personal and confidential data collected continues to increase and, second, that our data and information processing technologies have undergone radical change since the days of cuneiform and clay tablets. The use of the electronic computer and direct access storage devices have made possible the accurate and efficient maintenance of enormous libraries or data banks of information and the possibility of retrieving, inspecting, modifying, creating, or deleting particular data records or fields of records, all virtually instantaneously. In addition, the communications technologies permit the transmission of data records over thousands of miles, theoretically allowing users of a computerized data library to examine the contents of the library or to otherwise interact with it from anywhere on the globe, regardless of the library's physical location. Readers familiar with these capabilities in the Ohio College Library Center (OCLC) and Stanford's BALLOTS may not fully appreciate the fact that literally tens of thousands of similar systems exist outside librarianship. Many data bases in these systems are frequently comprised of personal data concerning individuals rather than bibliographic data about books and other library materials.

Unfortunately, the capabilities of the new information technologies imply unique disadvantages as well as advantages, especially in reference to the problem of guaranteeing the security of confidential and private information. Computerization of personal data records adds a new facet to the issue of social or jurisdictional utility versus individual privacy. Addressing itself to this subject, the International Commission of Jurists has commented, "The latest and potentially the greatest threat to privacy is the recording, storing, and dissemination of personal information by computers."[2] The dossier society clearly poses an increasing threat to personal privacy. Growing public realization of this threat has been reflected in the Congress, which, during the past decade, has conducted numerous hearings and investigations of the problem. These studies culminated in the recently passed "Privacy Act of 1974," (P.L. 93-573), signed into law by President Ford on December 31, 1974.

Privacy defined

The concept of privacy is elusive and difficult to define precisely. The best course to follow in this short article is probably to confine our attention to privacy in the special context of personal information systems. From this viewpoint, privacy can be defined as ". . . the condition enjoyed by one who can control the communication of information about himself."[3] "Control" here is to be taken as a relative concept rather than as an absolute; no citizen can ever enjoy total privacy without also submitting to total isolation. A measure of privacy is inevitably given up in exchange for the privilege of participating in society.[4]

A similar tension between privacy and participation exists on the level of societies, which, in order to perpetuate themselves, have a need to preserve and enforce their social norms and paradigms. This need inevitably entails a degree of often subtle psychological and physical surveillance over individual citizens by other citizens and a consequent loss of personal privacy. The conflict thus defined between the common good and the sanctity of the individual member of society is probably as old as societies themselves. Indeed, the way in which a society resolves this conflict—that is, the relative balance maintained between these needs within the society—defines an important difference between a liberal democratic society and a totalitarian society. In the context of personal data systems, it is clear that the right to inspect public records, for example, cannot be absolute and that "freedom of information" cannot be permitted to extend to a "clearly unwarranted invasion of personal privacy."[5]

Privacy and the law

The Ninth Amendment to the Constitution stipulates to the people that if any of their personal rights have been omitted from mention in the Constitution, that these rights shall not be considered to have been denied or disparaged. Thus, the Ninth Amendment implies the possibility of the existence of a body of fundamental, inalienable rights—such as, perhaps, a "right to privacy"—not explicitly enumerated in the Constitution. In his plurality opinion in Griswold v. Connecticut, Justice William Douglas argued that privacy is one such right, cutting across other constitutional rights. The 7-2 Griswold ruling invalidated a Connecticut statute which prevented the dissemination of birth control information, on the grounds that the law invaded marital privacy. Justice Douglas' argument contended that since privacy is incident to several constitutional goals, it should be declared a goal in itself.

Since the early part of the 20th Century, court decisions in the United States have established a common law pattern which tends to support this view. Such cases involved the unauthorized use of a person's name or photograph for personal advantage, the wiretapping and bugging of private conversations, the intrusion into a delivery room by a nonphysician, and the right of an individual to decide to have an abortion. However, even though a number of common law cases recognize a right to privacy, weaknesses in the common law approach have led some observers to suggest that the common law is insufficient to protect personal privacy and that protective legislation should be enacted for this purpose. Present and contemplated federal and state legislation, of which the Privacy Act of 1974 is the most conspicuous example, is a reflection of these concerns.

The issues

In April 1975 the library world was shocked to learn that the American Library Association was included on an Internal Revenue Service list of 3000 individuals and tax-exempt groups—many of which were regarded as protesters by the Nixon Administration. This and hundreds of similar disclosures relating to the excesses of the Nixon White House have had a significant role in awakening public awareness to the issue of personal privacy (as well as to the issue of freedom to information, which, as we have noted, is a somewhat contradictory principle). Even so, the privacy issue is not new. For decades prior to Watergate, concerned citizens worried about the privacy problem, exacerbated by the development of new and powerful privacy-invading technologies such as bugging and telephone tapping devices, and the use in photography of infrared film and the telephoto lens. Perhaps more threatening in the long run than any of these is the increasing use by government in the past decade of the computer and communications technologies to maintain and gain access to data bases containing personal information. In the mid-sixties, both the Senate and the House of Representatives began to conduct hearings on the potential dangers to personal privacy posed by this use. In one such hearing, Congressman Cornelius Gallagher of New Jersey summarized the concerns of his subcommittee:

> What we are looking for is a sense of balance. We do not want to deprive ourselves of the rewards of science; we simply want to make sure that human dignity and civil liberties remain intact. We would like to know just what information would be stored in a national data center; who would have access to it; who would control the computers; and, most importantly, how confidentiality and individual privacy would be protected. Thought should be given to these questions now, before we awaken some morning in the future and find that the dossier bank is an established fact, and that liberty as we knew it vanished overnight.[6]

This is not the place for a detailed examination of the several issues raised by Congressman Gallagher.[7] In the remainder of this article, we will sketch the main points of the Privacy Act of 1974 and suggest how the library community might be affected by this probable future legislation.

The Privacy Act of 1974

Public Law 93-573, known as the "Privacy Act of 1974," is the most recent result of a decade of national debate on privacy and automated personal data systems. Its passage demonstrated a remarkable degree of bipartisanship among members of Congress; its sponsors represented a wide range of political ideologies. The original House version of the bill was cosponsored by Representatives Goldwater and Koch, while the Senate version was written by Senators Ervin, Percy, Muskie, Ribicoff, Jackson, Goldwater, and Baker. The bill was passed in both houses of Congress by overwhelming majorities and became law at the end of September 1975. A major purpose of the Privacy Act of 1974 is to provide safeguards for an individual against an invasion of personal privacy by requiring federal agencies to:

> collect, maintain, use, or disseminate any record of identifiable personal information in a manner that assures that such action is for a necessary and lawful purpose, that the information is current and accurate for its intended use, and that adequate safeguards are provided to prevent misuse of such information.[8]

Despite the fact that privacy legislation received its greatest impetus from the development of new, privacy-invading technologies, the Privacy Act of 1974 applies to manual systems of record-keeping as well as automated systems. Thus it applies equally to files of records manually maintained on three-by-five cards and to sophisticated computerized systems permitting access to disk files by a network of remote terminals.

The Privacy Act of 1974 specifies that any individual on whom a personal data record is maintained by a federal agency must promptly be permitted by that agency to review his record and to correct or amend inaccurate, irrelevant, obsolete, or incomplete data. In addition, each agency is required to maintain in its records only data relevant to purposes mandated by legislative statute or by presidential order. The act further requires that federal agencies announce publicly in the Federal Register, at least annually, a complete description of personal data banks they maintain, including the categories of individuals on whom records are kept, the uses to which the records are put, and policies and procedures by which persons can gain access to their personal records and challenge their contents.

In the section of the bill most applicable to libraries, federal agencies are required to establish appropriate security measures to protect the confidentiality of personal data records. The act also explicitly states that identifiable personal data shall not be used for a purpose other than that for which the data were collected, or disclosed to other agencies, without written consent of the data subject. The act further requires federal agencies to establish rules of conduct for the designers and operators of personal data systems, reflecting the provisions of the act enumerated above.

The invasion of privacy resulting from having one's name and address sold or rented was also dealt with by the Privacy Act of 1974, which prohibited this practice by federal agencies. Also prohibited was the denial by any federal, state, or local agency to any person of any rights or privileges due to him by law as a result of his refusal to disclose his Social Security Number. In addition to these prohibitions, the act was given teeth by the Congress, which specified civil remedies by means of which the subject of an unfair information practice may bring suit to recover damages. Moreover, such violations of the act by agency employees would incur criminal penalties.

Finally, the Privacy Act of 1974 established a Privacy Protection Study Commission, to study the advisability of applying the principles and procedures of the act to organizations in the public sector, outside of the federal government, and in the private sector. Specifically cited as desirable areas for study were interstate transfer of information, the use of Social Security Numbers and other universal identifiers in personal data banks, and the misuse of statistical information systems.

Privacy and librarianship

Since the concept of intellectual freedom was first introduced, some librarians have clung to the rather narrow notion that freedom of expression is merely the absence of censorship. Likewise, the application to libraries of the recently revitalized concept of privacy has been viewed restrictively as the right of a library user to confidentiality merely in respect to circulation records. To the contrary, privacy is a far more complex concept than this. Librarians have only recently addressed themselves seriously to the problem of maintaining privacy and confidentiality for library users, as well as for librarians themselves. This fact is illustrated by the use of the subject heading "privacy" in Library Literature. It was first used only in 1970, at the peak of the political surveillance and repression of the Nixon administration.

The Privacy Act of 1974 was designed primarily to safeguard individual privacy from the misuse of federal records; libraries outside federal agencies do not fall under the provisions of the act. Even so, librarians in tax-supported institutions at the local and state levels (as well as those in private institutions) need similar legal guidelines designed to protect the privacy of individuals about whom they might collect, maintain, use, and disseminate personal information. New York passed the first state privacy legislation early in this century; however, the law was limited in scope. Widely differing policies, laws, and interpretations of concepts of privacy presently prevail over the nation. The time is ripe for concerned librarians to help promote and formulate laws at local and state levels relevant to the use of library collections and patron privacy. The Statement on Professional Ethics for librarians and the ALA Policy of Confidentiality of Library Records are significant documents, but they are inadequate to the task of providing legal protection against intrusions on library employees' and users' right to privacy. There have been a number of cases in which federal, state, or local officials have attempted to gain access to library personal data records.

Library privacy cases

In 1970, U.S. Treasury agents sought access to circulation files in several libraries, seeking information about borrowers of materials dealing with explosive devices. One federal agent wanted to know who had used books listed in the Milwaukee Public Library's card catalog under the subject "explosives." The request was at first denied on the grounds that library data about users' reading activities are confidential.[9] Several days later, however, the city attorney declared that there were no "private" records in the public library; therefore, the circulation records were released to the Treasury Department.[10] According to legal interpretations of Wisconsin laws, public records include all "written memorials made by a public officer [the librarian] within his authority where such writings constituted a convenient, appropriate, or customary method of discharging the duties of his office."[11]

In an incident at the Atlanta Public Library, Internal Revenue agents inquired about readers of "militant or subversive" books and users of information on the subject of explosives. Government agents wanted librarians to flag certain materials, but the request was not honored. On July 11, 1970, an editorial in the Atlanta Constitution noted that the IRS campaign "smacks of the totalitarian state." Significantly, the library's board of trustees then endorsed the decisions of Atlanta public librarians to deny federal agents access to library files. The board also passed a resolution noting that library circulation records are a private matter and are not subject to review by other agencies.[12] Also in reaction to IRS scrutiny of library records, the Minneapolis Public Library Board of Trustees formulated a written policy in July 1970 which stipulated that "under no circumstances shall the staff of the library ever answer to a third party about what a patron of the library is reading or calling for from the library's collection."[13]

Following these events, strong protests by practicing librarians and the American Library Association were registered about investigations conducted by federal agents. The ALA Intellectual Freedom Committee declared that IRS examinations of library records could lead to "irreparable danger to the educational and social value of libraries."[14] The Association of American Publishers endorsed ALA's action to maintain the confidentiality of library circulation files.[15] In addition, a group of approximately 30 librarians demonstrated before the Washington headquarters of the IRS on July 21, 1970 in protest of investigations of library charging records.[16] In December 1970 the Tucson Public Library joined others which prohibited the inspection of library circulation records without a formal court order.[17] In the college library field, the academic senate at California State College in Los Angeles approved the adoption of a policy prohibiting the release of details concerning borrower transactions with the library.[18]

ALA and IRS officials met in September 1970 and agreed to develop guidelines for "government access to specific library records in justifiable situations." Both organizations agreed, however, that "fishing expeditions" would be proscribed.[19] Some library leaders expressed disapproval with the ALA-IRS solution; however, it should be noted that not all librarians and public officials greeted policies aimed at confidentiality of library records with enthusiasm. For example, the board of the Rochester Public Library was notified by a city council member to meet with local law enforcement officers as well as FBI agents "to discuss an equitable method of exchanging information."[20] In another case, the Tompkins County Board of Representatives in Ithaca, New York responded unfavorably to a decision of the board of the County Public Library to limit access to circulation records to library employees.[21] And William A. McGalliard, vice chairman of the board of the Oklahoma Department of Libraries, spoke out against intrusions on privacy but expressed the idea that libraries are obligated to cooperate with law enforcement officers in resisting subversion and sabotage.[22]

In a recent case in Rockford, Illinois, police secured a court order in March 1975 to search the public library's circulation records for clues to a kidnapper. Several youths had been kidnapped and sprayed with paint in a ritualistic fashion; authorities were examining circulation files of occult materials in an effort to identify likely suspects.[23] In another recent case, a Texas Open Records Act was invoked by an editor of the Odessa American in an attempt to determine who had borrowed art objects and prints from the Ector County Library's fine arts collection. On July 10, 1975, Texas Attorney General John L. Hill ruled that while library circulation records and confidentiality for library patrons were not protected by current Texas laws and while there had been no previous judicial decisions relating to this specific privacy issue,

> . . . we believe that the courts, if squarely faced with the issue, would hold that the First Amendment of the United States Constitution, which is applicable to the states through the Fourteenth Amendment . . . makes confidential that information in library circulation records which would disclose the identity of library patrons in connection with the material they have obtained from the library.[24]

Attorney General Hill cited nine U.S. Supreme Court decisions dealing with issues such as free speech and privacy, including the right to dispense and to receive birth control information in private, the right to have controversial mail delivered without written request, and the right to attend a meeting without being questioned as to whether one has attended or what one has said. The opinion of the attorney general also noted:

> In light of these authorities, we believe that the First Amendment guarantee of freedom of speech and press extends to the reader or viewer, and protects against state compelled public disclosure of a person's reading or viewing habits, at least in the absense of a showing of a clear and present danger which threatens an overriding and compelling state interest . . . If by virtue of the First and Fourteenth Amendments, "a state has no business telling a man, sitting alone in his own house, what books he may read or what films he may watch" . . . then neither does the state have any business telling that man's neighbor what book or picture he has checked out of the public library to read or view in the privacy of his own home.[25]

A library user's privacy has clearly been invaded if a librarian reveals what kinds of books a patron has been reading. Releasing these kinds of data from public records does not constitute libel, because the data are not false; however, it does constitute an invasion of the user's privacy and might be embarrassing or more seriously damaging. We should observe that while we are aware of a few attempts by federal or local agents to examine library records—especially those resisted by librarians—we do not know whether similar cases went unreported or whether some librarians quietly cooperated with investigators engaged in political surveillance.

Confidentiality of library records

In an effort to curb invasions of privacy of library users, the Office for Intellectual Freedom prepared a policy, adopted by the ALA Council, which urged librarians to establish written guidelines, "... specifying that 1) library circulation records are considered confidential information, and 2) such records will not be used for non-library purposes except pursuant to subpoena or other valid process which specifically identifies the information required and the purpose for such a request."[26] We should carefully distinguish here between statistical records and personal records, the latter category containing personal information concerning identifiable individuals. Statistical records of circulation and other library data have to this date been put to little use by researchers, although they could conceivably be used advantageously by behavioral scientists and social historians in their research, as well as by pollsters, marketing specialists, and politicians, especially if broad characteristics of library users (such as sex, age, socioeconomic group, etc.) were available.

In the summer of 1975, the ALA Intellectual Freedom Committee revised its Policy on Confidentiality of Library Records to protect all library records—not only circulation files—from scrutiny by official agents of local, state, and federal governments. The revised policy, adopted by the ALA Council, recommends that all responsible officers of libraries refrain from making available confidential circulation records and other information which identifies the names of library users, unless "... a proper showing of good cause has been made in a court of competent jurisdiction."[27] The "good cause" stipulation has been interpreted as follows:

> Upon receipt of such process, order, or subpoena, the library's officers will consult with their legal counsel to determine if such process, order, or subpoena is in proper form and if there is a showing of good cause for its issuance; if the process, order, or subpoena is not in proper form or if good cause has not been shown, they will insist that such defects be cured.[28]

Libraries have little recourse to disclosures forced by courts for legislative, administrative, or judicial proceedings. To resist a subpoena the librarian must convince a court that the subpoena has been unlawfully issued in respect to a specific law which might prohibit the disclosure of the confidential information being sought.

Gerald R. Shields has noted that the idea of the library as a sanctuary is accompanied by "the demand that there exist between librarian and users a confidentiality as sacrosanct as that between doctor and patient, lawyer and client, priest and parishioner."[29] In the professional relationship between the librarian and the library client, information gained by the former about the latter falls within the realm of privileged communication, and the privilege belongs to the library user.

Personal information maintained in special libraries such as medical records and case studies contain sensitive data, the confidentiality of which should be protected. Typically, librarians have been charged with disseminating data on a wide scale, and the concept of freedom of access to information has been incorporated into most facets of library service. But librarians faced with the task of storing and maintaining personal medical or clinical case data must realize their responsibility to both protect individual privacy and to fill the need of the public's "right to know."[30] Addressing this point, a professional group from the field of medicine, the American Hospital Association, has prepared guidelines for the use of hospital medical records.[31]

1) What data concerning identifiable library users are necessary to effectively carry out library functions?

This question relates to information about borrowers for registration purposes—is it, for example, necessary for borrowers to provide their phone numbers or to state their sources of income in order to obtain library cards? It also relates to the issue of whether historical circulation files should be maintained.

2) What data are needed relating to library employees, and how should this data be utilized and kept confidential so as to promote the privacy and dignity of the individual? Information about scores on intelligence, personality, and vocational tests; moral standards; and marital status fall within the scope of this question.

3) How do codes and regulations about conduct, dress, and grooming of library employees and users affect individual privacy? Prohibitions relating to nonconventional dress and hair styles could be included here.

4) What regulations about employee memberships and personal associations infringe upon privacy? Information about employee associations with subversive organizations, unorthodox religious groups, and memberships in organizations such as labor unions, gay liberation groups, etc., could be included in this category.

Typically, administrators are not indifferent to employees; they are inclined to be concerned about the physical and emotional stability of those who work under their direction. Library directors are apt to be interested in or concerned about acceptable or idiosyncratic personal and professional behavior of staff members and to be on guard against disruptive actions that might ensue. Thus the question arises: where does legitimate administrative concern end and intrusion on privacy begin? Understandably, the development of personnel management in larger libraries has brought about increasing interest on the part of administrators in employee efficiency and motivation. However, the question of how administrative procedures and policies affect legal rights for personal privacy is still an open issue. In addition, the necessity and justifiability of certain practices relating to record maintenance in personnel departments of libraries requires further careful examination.

Privacy law in the future

Privacy legislation of 1976 and the future will almost certainly address itself to personal data systems maintained outside the federal government. Indeed, Representatives Goldwater and Koch introduced such a bill on January 23, 1975, the Comprehensive Right to Privacy Act, rather appropriately numbered H.R. 1984. In addition to extending the Privacy Act of 1974 to state and local governments and to the private sector, the Goldwater/Koch bill calls for the establishment of a Federal Privacy Board, to ensure compliance with the law. At a recent Data Communications Symposium held in Quebec City, attorney Ronald Winkler remarked that if H.R. 1984 retains its current number, it will be passed as a matter of political expediency.[32] State legislatures, too, are studying the privacy issue with respect to personal data banks. Minnesota has already passed its own version of the Privacy Act of 1974, and legislation has been introduced in several other states, notably Ohio and California. The future will almost certainly bring such legislation to state and local government levels as well as to private businesses and industry, and thus to school, public, college and university, and special libraries, both public and private.

It appears that the Privacy Act of 1974 is acting as a catalyst to the passage of additional legislation aimed at the state and local level. Librarians should encourage and provide input into the preparation of such legislation so that libraries can be adequately protected by law from the disclosure of confidential information about library patrons and practices. The library profession is in need of an exacting legal code which outlines responsibilities of practicing librarians in protecting the privacy and confidentiality of library records belonging to its employees as well as its users. Moreover, the profession requires careful formulation of policies defining the degree of confidentiality required for all types of library records and a precise definition of the subject matter about which unauthorized communication should be forbidden. H.R. 1984 defines "personal information" as:

> . . . all information that describes, locates, or indexes anything about an individual including his education, financial transactions, medical history, criminal, or employment records, or that affords a basis for inferring personal characteristics, such as finger and voice prints, photographs, or things done by or to such individuals; and the record of his presence, registration, or membership in an organization or activity, or admission to an institution.[33]

Clearly, the identity of library files to be covered by this definition is a matter of interpretation. Courts attempting to apply the law will be seeking expert opinion, and in this area the library profession should be prepared to offer guidance. If librarians do not provide the input to legislators and courts who are and will be struggling with the question, it can only be to our loss and to the loss of our patrons.

civil liberties, libraries, and

by JOYCE CROOKS

THE CIVIL LIBERTIES issues involved in the keeping of public records certainly arose prior to the use of computers, but automated information systems have, beyond any question, aggravated those issues involved in all areas of application and have made the need for legal protection crucial, if we are not to see a synergistic development of national dossiers in our time.

Librarians have not been significantly concerned with the questions involved in debates on the Right to Privacy and access to public records in the past, and they seem reluctant even now to realize that these issues will be of increasing concern in the future. All of us must become much more cognizant of the civil liberties implications of computers in general, and of the specific character of library computers for record keeping, especially borrowers' records and personnel files. In addition to the question of violation of privacy, networking and large-scale information retrieval applications have other ominous implications and must be discussed widely and knowledgeably if we are not to find ourselves with a national library information network which will be a dybbuk for generations to come.

Borrower's rights

The question of the rights of library users has arisen increasingly since the McCarthy era, usually in the form of a request to view the records of a particular borrower, or to see the names of all the persons who read a certain kind of book. Typically, such requests come from people representing considerable authority in a community, such as law enforcement personnel or members of city government, or from parents with what seems to be a legitimate request to see what their children read. Librarians who wish to refuse such a request often find themselves on very shaky ground; and while some who successfully resisted have been reported in the library press, it is unfortunately likely that many quick capitulations were never reported. I know of several such incidents from the San Francisco Bay Area, although they have been less frequent in the last couple of years, owing to the increased political sophistication of librarians, and to the official policy statement of the American Library Association,[1] however nebulous a help it may be in a showdown.

Until the recent Texas case no librarian has ever had any legal justification for such refusal. Before the Privacy Act of 1974, it has not been that simple to "establish" a right of privacy based on the Constitution alone, although the American Civil Liberties Union has expressed great interest in taking such a case. One of the especially thought-provoking and somewhat amusing precedents in the Texas case is that establishing the right of a man to read pornography in his own home.[2] If you can read pornography without undue interference of the state, you can read library books without undue interference of neighbors! In any case, it seems fairly certain that this will serve as a precedent to help protect libraries and librarians from casual violations of borrowers' records.

There still remains the problem of protecting the integrity of the files against law enforcement bodies with subpoenas in hand. The Privacy Act[3] is intended to protect individuals from the abuses of federal government files and is particularly applicable to automated retrieval systems and data banks. A data bank is very carefully defined as a combination of retrieval systems designed to gather otherwise scattered material in one place for more effective use regarding one subject.[4] It is intended to insure that citizens will know that information has been collected on them, and for what purpose; that the accuracy and timeliness of such information may be challenged; and that the file cannot be shared with other departments for other than its original purpose without the individual's consent. Exempt from the Act are all law enforcement agencies, or agencies claiming to be collecting intelligence data for law or national security purposes. In these circumstances, the citizen or library patron would have no protection. If a law enforcement office, FBI agent, IRS agent, or whatever, persuades a judge to issue a subpoena, however ill-advised, the librarian must obey it.

The buddy system

Although there has been some discussion about the integrity of borrowers' files, another form of widespread abuse—that of records of employees, public and private—has generated very little concern. This absence of concern is the result of two major factors: 1) The "buddy system" of casual information-sharing on individuals, between offices, colleagues, jurisdictions, to and from police, credit bureaus, etc., is so common that it rarely elicits any comments at all, although the effect of the exchange sometimes amounts to a "black list" based on hearsay, or inaccurate or biased information (Westin and Baker note that these exchanges are often in direct violation of laws or official policies); 2) an individual, particularly an applicant, is unable to challenge such information when he cannot usually even prove that such an exchange has taken place.[5]

One of the most sensitive areas in this regard is the arrest record. It has long been common practice for all civil service and governmental recruiting applications to include the question, "Have you ever been arrested?" It is also very common with large private employers. To answer "yes" often meant one would not be hired. There are 7.5 million arrests a year, of which one quarter result in convictions. Sixty percent of white urban males are likely to be arrested during their lifetime, compared with 90 percent of black urban males. Civil service jurisdictions did query applicants on arrest, according to one study, and 75 percent of the employment agencies studied in the New York area "would not accept an applicant with an arrest record . . . without conviction."[6] The innocent and the guilty suffer alike!

Since the mass arrests of large numbers of middle-class activists and bystanders in the 1960's, questions of police and FBI information exchange have received greater notoriety, insofar as such records are often incomplete and/or inaccurate. The information on dismissal of charges, or a not guilty verdict, is often omitted from the FBI or police records, since these verdicts are not of primary interest to these agencies. Consequently, many have been denied jobs almost automatically without any cause, and certainly without due process or recourse.[7]

Civil rights legislation now requires that only conviction questions be allowed on job applications, and that a job cannot be refused on the ground of conviction unless it can be shown that the offense directly relates to the prospective position.[8] But the casual sharing of police information with employers, and credit bureaus, remains a basic and major problem of due process and privacy for most library employees.[9]

An especially heavy stigma surrounds ex-drug users and those who have a history of mental health problems.[10] Activism in college can cause trouble, too, so much so that many colleges have stopped keeping files on club memberships,[11] so that FBI agents and other investigators simply cannot obtain such data, even with a subpoena. Many students have stopped joining clubs at all, for fear that participating in fully legal dissent activity in college could haunt them in later life.[12]

The Privacy Act no doubt has foreshadowed many attempts on the part of state and local governments to enact regulations and laws which will protect personnel files from casual intrusion. Solano County, California, has drawn up such a personnel rule.[13] This document includes some procedures that are notable in their regard for due process and fairness. Among these are: 1) Before information from the master personnel file is given to any law enforcement agency, the employee shall be notified so that he may obtain counsel if necessary. 2) Without a demonstrable "need to know," only public information can be revealed, for instance the fact that the employee works there, his salary range, length of service, etc. 3) The permission of the employee is not sufficient reason to reveal contents of a file. This last point brings up the question of the "informed consent" of the employee.[14] That is, is the employee necessarily the best judge of what s/he should or should not reveal? Credit bureaus, in particular, often operate in flagrant disregard for the rights of privacy, and often of the law; and the person applying for a loan, credit to buy a house, or whatever, is often reluctant to refuse information if it might jeopardize these services.[15] Present practice, that is, the routine invasion of privacy in which we are all used to living our lives, makes the refusal of information under conditions such as these seem like an act of heroism.

Libraries have not been in the forefront in computerization of files, or in the development of data bases for multiple functions, nor are they uppermost in the mind of the public with regard to needed controls. But because of the increasing reliance on information for decision-making in all areas of American life, libraries, too, will find careful planning of systems design and objectives mandatory, if they are not to find themselves embroiled in lawsuits and besieged by angry taxpayers. Those who have not had problems of protecting confidential information in the past will most certainly have them in the future.

The obvious question here is: why do computers make that much difference? There are a number of reasons: 1) A switch to computers means there is a tendency to collect more information on individuals than when that information had to be handled manually. 2) Protection of the system is more difficult as more points of access must be controlled, if the information collected appears more valuable than before (for example, increased inquiries into loyalty of personnel, or reading records) this can become a protection problem that could prove costly to solve. 3) The tendency to share information or a computer system within a jurisdiction or a network means many more persons have access to your files who do not share your priorities or loyalties, as in "time sharing" situations with other governmental offices. This can also be an enormous problem where libraries share a computer in a network, where there are state systems planning to add circulation programs to existing bibliographic ones, it is potentially a major civil liberties problem, and careful attention must be paid to what information is to be collected, and how it is to be protected, if individual rights are not to be violated.

As long ago as 1965, I heard a very forward-looking librarian say, while contemplating the possibility of a giant computer serving all of the libraries of the San Francisco Bay Area, "Just think, if someone had overdue books from Richmond, we could stop them from taking out books in San Jose." Which brings us to the final difference between manual files and computers: the astronomical difference in surveillance capacity.

Circulation control is surveillance

Since so many large and hitherto bibliographic or acquisition systems are considering this move to add circulation files and presumably borrowers' files, it is time to talk about the real nature of circulation records, in whatever form.[16] (Both Stanford's BALLOTS and OCLC are discussing plans to add circulation to their systems.) Circulation systems, put simply, are social surveillance systems. Any information retrieval system meets this criterion if: it "in general enhances the ability of organizations . . . to achieve their ends. In other words, 1) whenever a bureaucratic agency seeks to make and enforce discriminating decisions concerning a mass clientele, and 2) whenever these decisions must accord with details of clients' past circumstances of behavior, and 3) whenever they entail points of potential conflict between system and clientele, it is advantageous to the system to develop the maximum possible surveillance capacity." And further regarding the potentiality of library systems, ". . . centralization of filed data allows any system to bring the full weight of clients' records to bear in any decision-making concerning them, and prevents clients from evading the effects of their records through flight. It should likewise be clear that the extension of points of contact between system and clientele, by maximizing the incorporation of pertinent data and the ability to act aggressively towards clients when necessary, helps the task of surveillance."[17]

Note here that this does assume online capability—the ability to query the computer as to past performance of any patron within a few seconds. Technology is making the combination and sharing of files more possible than ever before. Although there certainly are manual files of data bank nature, the public has a justifiable fear of any mechanism that allows for increased surveillance.[18] Black people seem to be more aware, both of the necessity for giving up privacy to obtain public services, and of the violation of privacy in questionnaires for all purposes, and of political surveillance, as both Neier and Ervin point out in the works cited elsewhere. This might be one of the primary reasons public libraries have found it almost impossible to increase their clientele significantly in minority communities. The spread of computerized circulation networks, with their much more active surveillance nature, could mean fewer persons will be willing to trade additional invasion of privacy for library services.

General sensitivity to potential misuse of computerized information is of course increasing among all classes, which is what generated the study leading up to the Privacy Act.[19] The study was undertaken in response to widespread public apprehension about data banks, and what seemed an unlimited right of private data-collecting agencies, and especially of the government, to invade individual privacy. The main point of the study is that all automated data systems, not just federal systems, should come under a Code of Fair Information Practice. According to these recommendations, all data systems with individually identifiable information should have the following minimum safeguards: 1) one person should be directly responsible for the system; 2) each employee should be informed about the system and the legal consequences for leaking information to unauthorized persons, with specific consequences for such acts; 3) reasonable precautions must be taken to protect the system, in terms of both physical and electronic access; 4) no transfer of information may be made to other systems without verifying that security requirements will be maintained; 5) a complete and accurate record of all instances of access to the system must be kept; 6) the file must be as complete, up-to-date, and accurate as possible to minimize potential harm to individuals; 7) data must be eliminated from the files when it is no longer timely; 8) annual notices must be published describing each extant system and must cover: kind of information held, how many subjects are covered, policies concerning storage, the use to be made of data, and procedures whereby individuals can examine or correct files; and 9) specific procedures must be clearly delineated whereby the individual can challenge the data held, and a person must be able to obtain remuneration in court if all other avenues fail.

The regulations were necessary because few of these safeguards were being used by those responsible for data banks or computer systems.

The law, as finally enacted, states that only information necessary to the original purpose of the file can be collected, and that it must be removed from the file as soon as the original purpose is no longer served. It does not allow for the use of a Social Security number for any purpose except one connected with Social Security, and any information form asking for individual data to be fed to such a computer must show which questions are mandatory and which are optional.

Library data abuses

This new guideline brings up some very interesting questions about current practices in library borrower registration procedures. Librarians dimly perceive the surveillance nature of circulation records. They have asked for driver's license numbers, Social Security numbers, place of work, and other data not needed for the purpose of circulation. One library which has computerized its borrowers' records still asks some of these questions—then puts only the name and address into the computer and throws away the application. Libraries have never, to my knowledge, indicated whether or not omitting answers to questions would deprive prospective borrowers of library privileges.

The Privacy Act of 1974 applies only to federal computers and data banks, but also creates a commission "to prepare model privacy legislation for state and local governments." Such legislation, which would bring state and local governmental data bank jurisdictions under at least the same controls as the federal ones, is now pending.[20] Some local jurisdictions have already gone further. Berkeley, California, has enacted an ordinance which requires a social impact statement for any new or additional automated systems, and a study of alternate ways of doing the job, even of not doing the job at all.[21] It requires that new data programs have wide publicity within the city, and a public hearing before implementation of any new data bank plan.

The new federal bill will bring to a halt certain other abuses some librarians with new computer systems seem unable to resist. One of these is putting economic or occupational information into the computer in order to do a use study at some future date. The new bill will make the collection of such nonessential information by public libraries illegal.

People greatly fear the fact that computers create "unforgetting and unforgiving" record systems. They are especially apprehensive that the people who work with the computers treat "printouts" as gospel, and that clerks assume machines can't make mistakes. Westin and Baker point out, however, that machine records tend to contain more mistakes, not fewer, and that people who think record keepers, especially civil servants, have ever been noted for taking an individual's side in a debate with a written record have obviously never heard of Kafka.

Some libraries have already begun looking for ways to safeguard circulation and borrowers' records in computer situations. Some of these safeguards are: 1) the registration file can be kept separately from the computerized file and/or manually; 2) all circulation records can be erased from the file when the item is returned, and a record can still be kept showing how many times a book circulates; 3) books can be charged by an identification number instead of by borrower's name; 4) minimum data can be requested from the patron, extra questions, if asked, can be clearly indicated as "optional."

Librarians must weigh carefully whether the added ability to query a library user about books overdue or lost in another jurisdiction is worth the additional negative surveillance impact this will have with many borrowers. At issue here are the conflicting ideals of the law and order "wrong-doers should be punished" forces against those of forgiveness, the "people should be able to escape their past" group. The more data one has about patrons, the more it will be used. Challenging patrons from such data involves doing so face-to-face and in public. There are few people who would continue to use the library after such an affront to their dignity, and many bystanders are likely to be almost as greatly offended. These patrons are lost to the library. Can any of us afford such an image? What is the true cost of "efficiency" in such a situation?

Personal personnel records

The problems involved in the keeping of public records in libraries will still be relatively easy of solution compared to those of administrative files of employee's records, and the problem of reducing the prevalence of the "buddy system." James Rule found that no subject aroused more defensiveness and antagonism among administrators than this one. Why do employers think they must, or ought to, have so much information on applications that is not job-related? Do questions such as past medical history, psychoanalysis, past hospitalization, treatment for drug abuse, sex life, sex orientation, union membership, political activism or beliefs, or religious beliefs, really become problems on the job to the extent that routine violation of personal privacy and due process are justified? It is still common for interviewers to ask questions of a personal nature, especially whether women are going to get married, or have a baby and leave, and whether unmarried men are homosexuals. Two years ago, a delegation from the University of California, Berkeley, School of Librarianship came to a meeting of the San Francisco Bay Area Social Responsibilities Round Table to ask that the group investigate what they considered improper questions regarding their sex lives asked during oral interviews. SRRT did not do so because the students were too apprehensive about being identified to give even the names of the interviewing institutions.

Police are notoriously helpful at supplying wanted information to all governmental jurisdictions, and both police and private employers have virtually unlimited access to credit bureau investigation if they care to use them, which they often do.[22] New laws will not necessarily be a corrective remedy for these practices, for many of them now go on in disregard of existing laws and institutional regulations. Nothing can stop these practices but an increased awareness that personal privacy is being invaded and a decreased tolerance for them. When administrators see such practices as dangerous, that is, potentially leading to law suits, or as threatening to the organization, they will cease according to Rule.

Surveillance in our society

Our concepts of privacy have changed during the last two decades or so, and it is difficult to discuss how that has happened without a further discussion of surveillance in American life. Most Americans are now aware that they have probably been the subject of a dossier of some kind, as an employee (especially of a federal employer, or as a scientist), as a recipient of state or federal aid of any kind, as a credit bureau subject, as the result of an encounter with the police, but most likely, as someone who has come to the attention of one of the local police intelligence units, the FBI, or one of the more than 20 federal agencies collecting intelligence on private citizens.[23]

Evidence of their scope is all around us: the FBI opens mail of anyone who has been to Russia, including Boy Scouts. At the time of the Peace Marches in San Francisco, the employees in at least one Bay Area library were told by someone in the Sheriff's Office that they had photographs of all employees who had participated. Dossiers are opened on school children, carefully noting "anti-social" behavior, such as preferring to work alone.[24] No status provides protection. Congressmen are monitored also. Only just recently, Congressman Dellums complained his office was bugged. J. Edgar Hoover used to amuse various presidents with stories of the private wrongdoings of Congressmen, and Congressmen have greatly feared the dossier consequences of voting against appropriation requests of the FBI.[25] Dr. Martin Luther King's private life was monitored for years, and the FBI tried to blackmail him with the resultant tapes.[26] No one seems too unimportant for investigation; it is well-known that both FBI and CIA and all of the Armed Forces have secret investigators and informers on campuses.[27]

One might well ask, what do all of these people investigate? Anyone who is, or who is potentially, a dissenter to the U.S. government. That would include anyone who actually speaks out against the government, anyone who might become a leader and might possibly dissent in the future, all groups with potential power, especially all minority groups and potential minority leaders, labor unions, groups such as the ACLU or NAACP and individuals interested in constitutional rights, those involved in "Earth Day," etc. In fact, they seem for the most part to be investigating people involved in fully legal activities. It has been argued that the surveillance of legal activities produces a "chill" and an inhibition about continuing, or beginning, such activities. It also causes the activity to be looked on as "tainted," or somehow illegal, and those who engage in it as socially stigmatized. Additionally, it has been noted that there is a significant difference between the tolerance of dissentors in Britain and America, and it is believed that the lesser tolerance of Americans has been produced by systematic and continued surveillance as official policy by our government over a period of several decades. Even if surveillance stopped tomorrow, political activity would remain repressed, perhaps through several generations. Awareness of such all-pervading stigma does not disappear overnight.[28]

My generation learned its lesson watching our elders suffer during McCarthy's time for their political beliefs in the thirties and forties, and this generation has seen those politically involved in the sixties reduced to silence during the Nixon administration. The infamous "Houston Plan" approved by Nixon, included six recommendations amounting to a virtual definition of all citizens as "enemies." The plan included: 1) intensifying electronic surveillance of all domestic security threats and foreign diplomats; 2) increased monitoring of American citizens using international communications facilities; 3) increased mail coverage; 4) more informants on college campuses; 5) listing restraints on "surreptitious entry"; and 6) the establishment of an interagency group to coordinate existing intelligence and internal security agencies, with representatives from the White House, FBI, CIA, NSA, DIA, and the three militaries.[29] According to the recent revelations concerning the CIA, all of these things have already been done, except the last two, which were seemingly prevented by Watergate.

It would be comforting to think that it was the paranoia of our late intrepid FBI leader, reinforced by that of Nixon, which had brought us to our present acquiescence in the loss of our civil liberties, and that our institutions will automatically now revert to ones respecting due process and privacy, as befits a democratic country. The fact is, however, that Nixon's recommendations could not have been effected had not our civil liberties already been eroded.

John Raines, an Assistant Professor of Religion at Temple University, has written a most informative book reviewing the developments through which we lost our civil liberties. Raines says that it is through the conversion of the government into a guarantor of big business, necessitated by the New Industrial State (as described by Galbraith) which marked the change from a government of the people. This need for big business to control the market necessitated enormous amounts of social control, which only the government could provide. As Raines points out: "This is the result, not of bureaucratic necessity . . . but of the pursuit of human ambition and the bending of society for that purpose."[30] That this has been achieved is the real lesson of Watergate. Raines reminds us that it is the right of the people to watch the government, not vice versa, and that cosy regulation of business by the government for what is plainly their mutual benefit can be maintained only by the privatization of power and the pacification of public protest. In order for this to be effected, the affairs of the state must be secret, defined as "national security," and the affairs of the citizens must be public.

This has been accomplished by: 1) trivializing private needs; 2) stigmatizing activity which supports individual feelings of self-worth and self-reliance; and 3) humiliating people by forcing them to trade privacy for needed services. To quote Raines again: "Humiliation is the invasion of our inner silences and self-space to render us docile to the interests of others. It is an attack upon our dignity and reserve as persons."[31]

NCLIS and privacy

It has been necessary to wander into the society at large briefly in order to provide perspective on the issue of a national system of libraries as proposed by the National Commission of Libraries and Information Science.[32] The NCLIS plan is conceived of as a bibliographic, communication, and retrieval network of massive and inclusive proportions, involving public libraries, universities and colleges, information retrieval service companies, and other private companies involved in information services, including publishers.

Space does not allow a full discussion of the civil liberties issues which would be affected by this plan. Several of them can be touched upon here. Further discussion should be forthcoming.

First of all, the plan places an emphasis on machine retrieval and communication, including a heavy commitment of the federal government to support further research and development of all computer communications technology by private industry, and funding of all aspects of the program.[33] The plan envisions large public libraries forming the "backbone" of the network, although it would clearly be advanced researchers, scientists, and technicians who would benefit most by such a sophisticated information network, people who are not now served by the public libraries at all, but by special libraries and universities and colleges. The plan would do little for the public library user, or for school libraries, and most special libraries are of such a nature that they would receive little benefit. Such a network would necessitate a complete reordering of priorities away from public services in public libraries, because funds, personnel, materials, and time would of necessity have to be given to the network priority. There is little likelihood that sufficient funds would be available for both services and technology. For most of the public, this simply means less access to materials and services. The NCLIS package also includes the proposal to pass on the enormous costs of the technological package by charging the patron for information and services, which appears as a serious threat to the tradition of free public library access. The controversy over who will pay for what, and how much, is already raging.[34]

As now written the NCLIS plan is paradoxically capable of solving some of the acquisition and access problems of universities and special libraries while potentially lessening the services and materials available in public libraries. One acquisitions librarian commented to me that networking tends to limit the acquisition of unusual or "underground" material simply because there is no ready-made procedure for cataloging it. In Peter Simmons' paper previously cited it is noted that in general, network participation tends to diminish local autonomy.

The Commission Report states that they see the agency controlling a federal network as "neither all-encompassing, nor authoritarian, nor prescriptive, nor regulatory, but rather, that it should be supportive and coordinating." But participating agencies who accept grants for cooperation with the plan would be subject to the regulations of the granting agency. Therefore the granting agency could be described as a regulatory agency. Many other commentators see such an agency as both potentially powerful and possibly dangerous. One scientist takes the view that "regulation and control is the proper function of government."[35] Olson, Shank, and Olsen state flatly that a national system will not work without regulation, or even "monolithic control."[36] "One reason for doubt about effective action on the national level is the lack of centralized control over information services in the U.S.," they state, and go on to cite a study which lists eight centers of influence in U.S. libraries. The study expresses further doubt that such a network involving all libraries can be established under any circumstances.

We would do well, therefore, to concern ourselves with the implications of federal control. One model we have to look at is the Federal Communications Commission. The FCC is known to have a black list of thousands of names to whom it will not issue licenses; and in November 1975 the Washington Post printed an article attacking the FCC for not being able to keep up with technology and being too close to the companies they are supposed to be regulating.[37] In short, most government regulating bodies we are familiar with behave as Raines describes. If such a body is needed to carry out this plan, it behooves us to wonder if the benefits could possibly outweigh the civil liberties threats involved.

Attention should also be paid to the problems that will arise as publishing via a computer becomes commonplace, especially if that computer is part of a national system. It is expected that growth of publishing by machine will greatly accelerate, and that growth of scientific publishing will virtually explode. Machines have in fact already begun to change the nature of publishing.[38] The demand for less scientific duplication,[39] and the expense of information retrieval will all contribute to the necessity of controlling information at the source of publication.

Finally, one can only question why information is suddenly of federal priority status. Does the federal government really care about the dangers of "information chaos"? They have not heretofore been known as generous supporters of either libraries in general, or even of federal libraries,[40] although they have put over $1 billion into computers.[41] Can it be that libraries, information sources, and the "private sector" are now recognized as essential adjuncts to the research necessary to increase the G.N.P., insure national defense, and aid "internal security"? If the growth of the products of technological communications, especially 2-way cable TV, leads to the necessity for making communication products more homogenous (as books are in Russia), in order for the "private sector" to make a profit, so much the better. Control need not be repressive in intent to be repressive in fact. It need only be total. Consider the highly mechanized "model" libraries in Russia, mentioned by Simmons.

We now are at a turning point and must make a choice. The "easy rider" approach is before us. We can ride on the backs of the federal priorities, where the big money is, and establish, or attempt to establish, a national system of disparate parts with uncertain outcome, and unknown costs. Or, we can continue to look for solutions for parts of the problem, establish homogenous networks, explore further ways of sharing, etc., while we carefully consider alternate structures. More answers are needed, by far. Would the public commit us to a national plan if they were asked? I for one do not see any more reason for thinking there exists only one solution than that there is only one problem for all libraries.

In the end, there is one important question, and that is whether 1984 will happen while we are admiring the efficiency of it all, or whether we will insist that machines must be used for social objectives that include human values as their basic component.
